Sanford Tells Graduates UNC Leads N. C. Progress

Gov. Terry Sanford told some 2,600 graduates at UNC's June 1, graduation exercises in Woolen Gym that, "the University is the chief instrument of progress in North Carolina.

"It is not enough for this University to train lawyers, doctors, businessmen and scholars," Sanford added. "Somewhere in democracy's educational system, the leaders of today and those of tomorrow must be shown the vision of where we must go if we are to achieve our ideals."

Sanford said the University here has always had its critics, but the "University has not been attacked because it has failed. But because it has succeeded, and because of its success some people small in number and spirit have resented its leadership."

Sanford suggested that the University take its case to the people covering the state with faculty members, administrators, trustees, students and friends talking to any group willing to listen.

"In every speech they give they must explain the University's mission. They must explain that voices dissenting from the majority will provide the clash of ideas from which our progress will flow.

"Taking the University to the people in this fashion will breed understanding of the University and confidence in its leadership," Sanford said.

In addition to the approximately 2,600 degrees that were awarded, the University also honored four men with honorary degrees.

The four recipients and the degrees awarded them are:

Sidney Alderman Blackmer, an actor, a doctor of humanities degree; Fred Wilson Morrison, lawyer, educator and philanthropist, doctor of laws degree; George Meyer Stephens Jr.,

author, editor and publisher, doctor of laws; and the Rev. Olin T. Brinkley, President of Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, a doctor of divinity degree.
