A number of these organizations said that loss of accreditation would automatically cut off funds, while some said that this action "would raise serious questions." Others replied that their grants were based on criteria other than accreditation.

The Carnegie Foundation said that while accreditation was not a direct factor in the distribution of grants, it had been a number of years since the organization had given funds to a non-accredited institution. The Foundation stated flatly that it favors repeal of the speaker ban law.

Organizations which wrote to Boozer included the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the National Aeronautics and Space Agency, the National Science Foundation, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Department of Agriculture and the Peace Corps.

A spokesman for a branch of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare wrote: "It would be unlikely that this office would select an unaccredited institution for training grants."

The Department of State also wrote that it deals only with accredited institutions. The Department of Defense informed Boozer that accreditation is mandatory for some programs and would "create problems" on others.

One of the major areas which would be affected by a loss of accreditation would be tuition assistance under the National Defense Education Act. During the past year 840 students on this campus received $541,815 in tuition supplements. During the next two years this is estimated to total $1,083,000. Most of this aid would be threatened by a loss of accreditation.

However, Boozer, pointed out that many agencies making grants base these on the qualifications of the faculty, and that if an institution lost its accreditation, it would also lose its top faculty members.

Asked to give an example of this, Boozer mentioned that a large number of top faculty and administration members left the University of Mississippi when it was placed on probation recently.

Some 150 spectators watched the commission proceedings along with a state-wide television audience. Sessions were held in the auditorium of the Legislative Building in Raleigh.

Hearings were to continue today with officials of American Association of University Professors to speak this morning and the American Legion to present its case this afternoon.

No dates were announced yesterday for the commission's next public hearing. Britt has implied that it will be in early September.
