Tar Heel Marching Band Will Perform At Half Time

The University of North Carolina Marching Tar Heels, under the direction of Major John Yesulaitis, will perform today in Kenan Stadium during half-time.

The band has incorporated a "block progression" drill into its football halftime shows this year.

The sequence involves the formation of patterns of squares while the band marches, spreading out into a larger area and drawing back together.

Following the drill the band will salute both the University of Michigan and the University of North Carolina.

Daily drills have been held since Monday in preparation for this routine.

A spokesman for the UNC Band said that the group is in the process of expanding this year, with its membership now approaching 100.

They will perform at eight of the scheduled 10 games, traveling to State, Duke, and Wake Forest.

Football And The Bottle

Football games of the Roarin' 20's were once described as events involving raccoon coats and hip flasks. The modern grid attraction, in the South, is all but divorcing both.

The coat is seldom needed. Last year five games were played on the University of North Carolina campus to shirt-sleeve crowds. Games as late as November. Only a fraternity pledge on initiation day would dare wear such a coat.

Drinking at games, which is prohibited on campus and enforced as strictly as possible, has slowed considerably as compared to the old days. Perhaps it is the hot weather; perhaps the games have become so enjoyable the average fan can't afford to miss the action.

"Our starting times of 1:30 p.m. have proved to be quite attractive to the public," notes

Athletic Director C. P. (Chuck) Erickson of UNC. "This is rather early in the day for almost anyone to start a party. We want our spectators to have fun, but we definitely discourage drinking at the stadium."

"We try to be quite understanding with our students and guests," says Dean of Student Affairs C. O. Cathey, "but we also take a firm stand against drinking at games. We take special precautions to see that it is not done. We greatly appreciate the cooperation we have received from the public in past years."

"Thrills are expected to be 100 proof," Erickson said. "It is a far better stimulant than the kind that comes in a bottle."
