UNC-G Coeds Give Various Reasons For Coming Where The Boys Are

By HAROLENE ATWOOD
UNC-G Carolinian

For the first time in UNC's history, freshmen women have been allowed to enter the University. Even so, the annual deluge of sophomore women transfer students from area colleges has not ceased.

In a girl-on-the-street interview at UNC at Greensboro this summer, several coed transfer students were queried about their migration. "Why are your transferring to Carolina this year?" they were asked by the Carolinian, the UNC-G student newspaper.

Julia Napolitano: The main reason I'm transferring to Carolina is because I plan to major in special education. UNC-G does not offer it. I would like a change. Going to an all girls' school has its advantages and disadvantages.

Susan Mitchell: No reason in particular. I just don't like this place and so I'll go over there.

Broadening

Linda Goldstein: I think the experience of attending a girls' school is good; however, I need a broader experience which is to be found in a large coed university. At a school such as this, I have been exposed to certain situations and people of various socio-economic, religious and regional groups unlike my own. This has helped to mold my personality, but there is more to college than this.

Billie James: The main reason I'm leaving is because there aren't any activities here where you can come together. There isn't a feeling of belonging. You can get to know the people better at a coed school. Cheryl Matthews: I am going to UNC-G because I would like to attend a large coed school for two years and Carolina has more to offer in my major field—Anthropology. Dana Bonkemeyer: This school is too large. Because of its size, exceptions are not often made. Individual needs are sacrificed to the education of an average college student. Also, the intellectual atmosphere does not challenge the inquisitive mind.

Joan Archer: I'm an army brat and have always moved around all my life. I'd like to get a different view of life. Also, my father teaches at Carolina.

Gayle Sawyer: "If you were five feet, eleven inches, wouldn't you want to go where the boys are?"

Linda Coven: I can't get my major here without it being a double major.

Jane Caulkins: I feel like I'm missing out on real college life. There's too much study here. Even though I may be in class from eight to five everyday at Carolina, I'd rather be there than here where it's like a girls' boarding school.

Pat Carter: East Carolina is at home. I had planned to transfer after two years.

Sheltered

Betsy Finison: Carolina is a lot less sheltered in the respect that UNC-G is not a real life situation. I need some transition to meet life and the world. At Carolina, I think I could learn to cope with more of a variety of situations and problems.

Margie Erickson: I can get my major there on the undergraduate level. I have never really loved it here, anyway, and think I'll like it better at Carolina.

Nellie Dekok: Everyone here is wrapped up in their weekend world; the students don't seem to get involved in news, etc. I'd like to go where there is a more extensive program. Terry George: Since social matters will be more convenient, I have nothing to lose by transferring and I possibly have something to gain.
