Executives Don Role Of Students

By MARY JO HESTER
Special to the DTH

Forty-seven major executives from North Carolina and neighboring states will once again don the role of students on the UNC campus on Thursday as they participate in the 13th annual Executive Program of the School of Business Administration.

This week's visit will mark the fifth of the alternate weekends in the Program, which includes two weeks of full-time residence and eight alternate weekends. The Program runs from October through March of each year.

During the period between 1943 and 1958 many universities in the United States and Canada began to offer management courses for men already occupying management positions. Today there are approximately 40 advanced management programs within the United States.

The University of North Carolina established its first Executive Program in 1953 with Dr. Willard J. Graham as initiator and director.

Before coming to North Carolina, Dr. Graham directed a successful program for 10 years at the University of Chicago.

"I would certainly put this (program) in the top five Executive Programs in the country, for several reasons," director Graham said in a recent interview.

"We get substantially more homework, individual work, than most other Programs because of the spaced schedule."

The men study at home between sessions, in small discussion groups, and in class meetings. This affords them "more total exposure to ever assignment, case, and problem than most other programs," Dr. Graham said.

"Per class hour, this sort of operation has a greater, more lasting impact on the student," he said.

Another reason why UNC's Executive Program is among the top, Dr. Graham stressed, is that "we have close to the best faculty of any program with which I am acquainted, and I'm acquainted with quite a few. We really have a tough bunch of faculty members in the Program."

Other features which make Carolina's Program unique include the long-range plan and the Management Development, INC. (MDI). Upon application to the Program, each executive must develop a long-range plan for his company. Many have followed the plan through to its maturity.

MDI is a stock corporation chartered by the alumni of the Program to expand this contributions of the Program throughout the state.

MDI, by invitation, enters a community to conduct an Institute taught by alumni of the Executive Program. The alumni receive no pay but are awarded shares of MDI. Approximately 500 businessmen
