

Guidance Aid Offered

By MARTHA FOWLER
Tar Heel Staff Writer

Benjamin and anyone else who's a little worried about his future should hear about the free "package deal" that the Guidance and Testing Center in Peabody Hall offers UNC students.

Vocational counseling, aptitude testing, occupational and educational information make up the service which is designed to help in the selection of a student's academic major and ultimate vocation. Connected with this service is a reading program aimed at the improvement of reading and study skills.

Both programs emphasize flexibility in structure and procedure which allow for easy adaptation to the particular needs of each student.

An informal discussion between a vocational counselor and the client concerning his academic background, work experience, interests, goals and any specific problems that he might have in such areas usually begins the decision-making process in the guidance program.

The initial battery of tests usually includes interest inventories, temperament and personality inventories and mental ability tests. Achievement, diagnostic, and specialized aptitude tests are sometimes selected for use on the basis of information obtained from the first interview.

Most of the tests can be interpreted by the counselor soon after completion. A discussion of the significance of test and inventory scores along with other pertinent considerations follows.

A major intention of the counselor is to suggest several tentative academic or vocational objectives for further investigation.

The Educational-Occupational Library, specialists in fields under consideration and related course work or job experience may help the student to make a final decision concerning his academic or occupational future.

Appointments may be made by telephoning the reception office at 933-2175 in 019 Peabody Hall.

During the summer sessions, the Reading Program offers a voluntary, non-credit course for students at any level of reading skill who feel that improvement would be helpful.

Initial tests and classes are scheduled to suit the individual's convenience. Students may register for diagnostic testing and individualized reading instruction in Room 106, Peabody Hall. The only cost is a supply fee of two dollars.
