

Workers Get Back Pay

(Continued from page 1) immediately by the University. He said "just about all" of the money thus earned would have to be used to pay the workers.

In past years, Jones said, the food service had set aside a surplus of funds which might have been used to pay the workers. However, the surplus has been depleted in the last several years to meet operating expenses of the Food Service which was losing money.

There are no penalties involved in the $180,000, Jones said, but, under the law, the individual workers could sue for damages in addition to their back pay if they so desire.

Jones said that the federal agency had found no intent to defraud or evidence of intent concerning the pay shortages.

Of about 1,000 food services workers employed at one time or another during the period, 500 were found to be due back wages.

Young New Manager Of SAGA Operation severely reprimanded for taking a break after the manager told her they were too understaffed to replace her long enough for a break was responsible for the managerial change.

"I was already in a motel in Raleigh Sunday night and I didn't even hear about it until Tuesday night," he said.

The company had been thinking about moving Young here for three weeks, he said, but admitted that O'Brien did not learn of the change until Monday afternoon when Young arrived on campus.

"It is not the kind of thing you tell someone over the phone," Young explained.

Young took over management as soon as he arrived Monday.

He stressed that there was a NEW manager and that there would be changes.

"We have nothing to offer but quality food and professional management," he said.

"There is an excellent professional team here," he said, and added proudly that he had hired or worked with these men before.

Young met informally with representatives of the Student Government Fair Food Service Committee which has been looking into workers problems and requested permission to talk with the entire committee.
