Ugandan to enter politics

by Jessica Hanchar
Staff Writer

A UNC graduate student from the Republic of Uganda will return home December to campaign for election to the Uganda Parliament.

Samuel Kasadha has a problem, however. He needs money with which to return and campaign.

"I need students to donate for me anything from a dime to a dollar to enable me to return to my country to campaign for victory for my people," said Kasadha.

Kasadha will have booths set up around campus this week to obtain contributions from students.

The native of Uganda was invited to run for election this spring by friends and other members of Parliament.

Uganda, a democratic republic in Africa, achieved its independence in 1962 from Great Britain. The country is bounded by Kenya on the east, Congo on the west, Sudan on the north and Tanzania on the south.

Kasadha, a student in the School of Public Health, believes that Africans will not be completely free until they develop a stable, independent economy.

"We want economic independence, a high standard of living, a prosperous, fear-free society," said Kasadha. "We believe that communism is not the answer to our needy problems," he added.

He said the source of his country's problem is the lack of the "know-how" to exploit their rich resources.

"Our next Parliament will be faced with problems that are vital to our republic, our continent and our people," said Kasadha.

"With the experience I have as an engineer and the knowledge I have gained from this highly developed country, I hope to get what my people want and what they believe in," he said.

Tom Bello, student body president, said Monday, "I think that the republic of Uganda needs candidates of the caliber of Mr. Kasadha. I hope students will contribute to his cause."

Colombian Exchange set for adventurous-minded

by Karen Jurgensen
Staff Writer

"Someone who's adventurous, who wants to learn what there is to know outside of books" should go on the Colombian Exchange says Colombia Guillermo Alvarez.

Applications for the exchange program will be available in Carr Dormitory this week. All applications must be returned to Carr by 5 p.m. Friday.

The final selection of two students will be made after each applicant is interviewed on Saturday morning. The interviews will be conducted by a panel headed by International Student Center Chairman Jeff Hilliker at 10 a.m. in Carr.

Any student of the University is eligible for the year-long, full-scholarship, exchange with the Colombian Antioquia University. The only stipulation is that the student return to UNC to graduate. Generally juniors and seniors apply. Judgment is based in part on grades and ability to speak Spanish.

Guillermo, one of two students here from Colombia on the UNC end of the exchange, described Medellin, where the university is located, as the "place of eternal spring" (year-round temperature averages 72-76 degrees).

The campus is located in the center of the city which boasts a million and a half inhabitants. There are 13,000 students in the university which first opened this new campus in 1967.

Guillermo explained that since the university is new it is modelled after American counterparts. Basically the academic system is the same as that of Carolina.

The great part of the exchange, said Guillermo, is the cultural and political lesson available to the gringo. An exchange student has the opportunity to know "a new environment, people, culture and different life style," he said.

One big difference Guillermo points out between his country and the United States is that Colombia is less mature politically. Because of this immaturity, he said, there are all types of political groups on the Antioquia campus.

In the Medellin area Guillermo said trips into the countryside are easy and cheap. There is skiing in the nearby mountains which surround the valley town. Sports, except American football, are readily available.

There are approximately 200 foreign students at the University of Antioquia coming from South America, the United States and Europe. There are about 15 American students.
