

GPSF losing separation fight

by Norman Black
Staff Writer

The Graduate and Professional Student Federation (GPSF) has now been faced with a new delay in their quest for recognition.

It now appears extremely doubtful that the GPSF will be recognized as an independent governing body by the beginning of the fall semester, according to Student Body President Joe Stallings. "Chancellor J. Carlyle Sitterson is apparently not going to recognize the GPSF this summer," Stallings said. "Since the graduate students have not made use of the established procedures for obtaining their independence, I feel the Chancellor has made the correct decision."

Walter Baggett, president of the GPSF, expressed surprise at the recent turn of events.

"Last February, Chancellor Sitterson stated that he intended 'to recognize the GPSF as the representative and governing agency for all graduate and professional students enrolled in the University' and 'that beginning with fall semester, the GPSF will be responsible for the administration of student activity fees collected from its constituency.'"

"We feel that separation is in the best interests of both the undergraduate and graduate students of this campus, and we will continue to work for this separation," Baggett said.

Stallings does not agree with Baggett, however.

"The role the GPSF should play is that of a semi-independent body as established by Student Legislature last spring," Stallings said.

"This would put them in the same category as the Residence College Federation and the Black Student Movement. They would be allocated money by the Legislature, and could advocate plans for the interests of their grads quite effectively," Stallings said.

Stallings said he feels there should be only one student government at Chapel Hill.

Infirmary board role still up in the air

by Norman Black
Staff Writer

"The creation of this new board will follow the same pattern as any other administrative board in the University."

These are the words of Dr. Claiborne Jones, assistant to the Chancellor, as he considered the powers and duties of the new Administrative Board for the Student Health Service.

Jones, speaking for Chancellor J.

Carlyle Sitterson, who is on vacation, said the board will be advisory in nature, with all appointments made by the Chancellor.

However, Student Body President Joe Stallings and the Student Health and Welfare Committee both feel that the board should be more than an advisory body.

"In the past, conflict arose because students felt the infirmary was not responsible to them, and because there was little communication," Stallings said.

"This new board could eliminate many of the problems from last year, but it should be more than an advisory board. I want to be sure that this board has some real power. We need a clear definition of this board's authority."

Sitterson feels the board should "formulate policies governing Student Health Service operations, advise the director concerning administrative matters, and review and approve innovative changes in services by the Health Service."

The board will hold regular meetings and will not work "at the whim of the director" according to Sitterson. It will, along with the director, report to the Chancellor through the Dean of Student Affairs.

Another area of disagreement involves the composition of the board.

The Student Health and Welfare Committee feels that the board should consist of 12 people: six students, four faculty members and two administrators.

Sitterson has not yet decided on the number of board members, but according to Jones, feels that the number of students, faculty, and administrators on the board should be equal.

Dr. James Taylor, newly appointed director of Student Health Services, also disagreed with the Chancellor on the number of student members.

"My impression would be that the largest number of members would be from the student body," Taylor said.

Taylor views the board as an opportunity for everybody to get together on a regular basis to discuss problems which relate to the infirmary. However, he also feels the board should operate only in an advisory capacity.

Jones could find no reason to pre-judge the effectiveness of the new board if it was advisory in nature.

"We have long years of precedent when judging the effectiveness of our administrative boards," Jones said. "Like any board, its effectiveness will depend on the people appointed."

Sitterson announced last week that he will make appointments to the board before the start of the fall semester.
