

North Carolina coastal areas

Protective laws urged

by David Klinger
Staff Writer

Alarm is being sounded over the rate at which commercial development and land speculation are engulfing North Carolina's coastal areas. Two UNC law students have recently completed a report which may encourage the General Assembly to approve coastal protection legislation.

$2,000 to support the project, conducted under the supervision of Dr. James C. Wallace, visiting professor of environmental law.

Officially entitled "Coastal Area Management in North Carolina—Problems and Alternatives," the report urges passage of the Comprehensive Coastal Area Management Bill during the next session of the General Assembly. The bill would provide strong environmental controls to help restrict coastal overdevelopment.

The report also recommends strengthening the N.C. Board of Water and Air Resources, the agency charged with the protection of the state's resources.

Environmental groups have frequently criticized the board for failing to adequately control pollution, an inadequacy which state officials blame on insufficient funding and staffing.

In addition to coastal protection legislation, the Mountain Area Management Act and the State Planning Act are pending in the state legislature. Passage of this package of planning bills will give the state increased power in determining the rate at which wilderness is developed and the type of controls necessary for stringent environmental protection.

"We are probably in the forefront of most states. I think we're ahead of them on laws already on the books and, I'm sorry to say, about even with them on enforcement of those laws," Bode commented.

Bode and Farthing have also investigated the public trust doctrine, a complex legal procedure, and its application to state protection of coastal lands.

Although lands that are continually submerged along the coast are held in trust for the people of the state under this doctrine, complicated legal problems have arisen over coastal estuaries, lands under water only at high tide.

Because of this unresolved question over whether the state owns land constantly under water or coastal estuaries, plans for comprehensive land use legislation have been stalled awaiting a definite legal ruling.

Bode foresees the attitude of coastal North Carolinians as gradually evolving from one of development and maximum utilization to one of environmental preservation.

"I really think the people in eastern North Carolina are coming around to our viewpoint. I think you have to fault the people in the state who relay information to them for past ignorance. I'm still not sure that some of the local people fully appreciate how their environment works and how water pollution occurs," he said.

The report states: "Growth, progress, and broadening the tax base at the expense of the environment have become fervent dreams of many residents who hope to break the chain of poverty in many coastal counties. Yet others on the coast now realize that uncontrolled growth, like cancer, is not progress."

Bode and Farthing recommend strong environmental protection with an awareness of the dire economic straits which many coastal communities continue to experience. "Protection must be genuine and forceful, for to many the estuarine zone represents perhaps 'the most valuable and most vulnerable natural trust placed in the hands of this generation,'" they said.

Don't let that sad, mournful look fool you. Abby is as happy as a lark. The pooch is the pet of a UNC professor who likes to bring his pet to work. Abby waits patiently in the office while her master goes to class. As long as nobody complains... (Staff photo by Bill Wrenn)
