

Service helps students buy, sell dorm contracts

by Vernon Loeb
Staff Writer

A very new service has been established by the Residence Hall Association (RHA) which helps people interested in selling dormitory contracts find people off-campus who want to buy them, RHA president Betsy Jones said Thursday.

A policy change allowing students to buy and sell their own dorm contracts is responsible for the Real Estate service, Jones said. A proposal for such a service was part of her platform in last month's special RHA presidential election.

Students interested in selling dorm contracts last year had to submit them to the housing department, which then coordinated the transaction.

"I think this year's policy is better for students," Jones said. "There are no longer restrictions on selling contracts. Before the policy change, dormitory residents really didn't have the right to move out of a dorm unless a serious problem, such as a financial crisis, developed."

Last year, the University would buy back a contract, but getting them to do so was difficult, Jones said. The University will still buy back a contract, if a student is forced to leave school for medical reasons.

A list of students interested in buying and selling contracts will be posted in the RHA office shortly. The names of 40 students wishing to sell contracts have already been accumulated. Fifteen students interested in buying contracts also have submitted their names to the service.

In anticipation of the spring semester rush to sell contracts, Jones advised students to register early with the service.

She also said it was important that students realize the University still prohibits students from selling one dorm contract and buying another.

Students can learn more about the service from residence directors who have become acquainted with the operation.

Frat rush down Against national trend

by Jim Bule
Staff Writer

Contrary to national trends, rush—the process by which students select fraternities—is down slightly at UNC for this semester. Only about 18 per cent of campus males are members of fraternities.

The University of California at Berkeley, traditionally a national pacesetter, reports a resurgence of interest in the Greek system. Ten chapters that closed in the 1960's for lack of interest have now re-opened.

When Berkeley and other campuses were declaring the death of the Greek system in 1969, UNC fraternities were at the peak of their popularity. Nearly 25 per cent of undergraduate males donned the Greek label then.

So, while fraternities may have reason to be optimistic about their long-range future, they are dissatisfied with present levels of participation.

"We may pick up again in the spring, but there's no guarantee of that unless we get moving now," Joe Husted, Inter-fraternity Council (IFC) president, said.

Several fraternities, notably all-black Omega Psi Phi, coed St. Anthony Hall and Delta Kappa Epsilon, have reported exceptional, scheduled rush periods.

The old system, in which students had only three days each fall and spring to check out fraternities, was abandoned. Some thought that in such a short period students could not easily decide whether to pledge a fraternity and brothers could not adequately evaluate rushes.

Husted attributed the overall mediocre turnout at this fall's rush to the "transitional period that fraternities are going through." He said there has not been a total adaptation to the new rush system since its implementation last fall.

Several rush chairmen have noted that the lack of positive publicity about fraternities, the poor economic situation and a misunderstanding of the new rush system have impaired the success of rush.

"We have to let the public know that rush does not stop with the formal rush period," said Bob Wilson, newly-appointed I.F.C. vice president for public relations.

Roslyn Hartmann, Assistant dean of student affairs and IFC faculty advisor, agreed. "Fraternities nowadays must seek out rush prospects," she said.

Although formal rush still exists, brothers are expected to recruit rushees throughout each semester and even during the summer.

The IFC holds office hours from 3:30 to 5 p.m. Monday through Thursday in Suite B of the Union. Students are invited to drop by or phone: 933-2064.

Committee petitions for funds

by Henry Farber
Staff Writer

The first meeting of the town Transit Advisory Committee was scheduled to be organizational in nature, but the informal discussion quickly turned into a sharing of concrete ideas for the future of the bus system, with emphasis on the acquisition of federal funds.

Lee Corum, one of the group's three UNC student members said the new committee's main objective is "to increase the dependability and convenience of the system through federal dollars—hopefully without increasing users' costs or local tax support."

The committee, an advisory body to the transportation department (subsidiary of professional town management) and the Board of Aldermen (elected officials), resolved that "the Board of Aldermen be urged to get on as expeditiously as possible with the submitting of a capital grant proposal," to be submitted in November.

According to a planning report handed out by town Transportation Director John Pappas, a federal capital grant would be used to purchase new buses, fareboxes, radios, to develop park-and-ride lots and to construct bus shelters, garages and offices.

However, the town does not have enough money left over from the local bond referendum to match the federal funds needed to make needed improvements on the present system, the report read.

The committee discussed ways to supplement a capital grant, with key interest on a demonstration proposal grant which, according to Pappas, would fund up to 100 per cent of operational costs.

A demonstration grant would not apply to capital expenses, but would pay for additional operational needs, Pappas said.

The bus system's $200,000 operational deficit for this year will probably grow, Pappas said, even with projected increased ridership.

To qualify for a demonstration grant, the town must be innovative and must evaluate its innovations, committee members said. Some innovations already in practice have impressed federal officials, members said, and recently warranted the publication of an article on the bus system in a transportation trade magazine.
