

Women's studies plan approved

by Nancy Mattox
Staff Writer

A plan which will eventually establish a complete women's studies program was approved Friday by the UNC Faculty Council. The move ends a 16-month study period for a group of 15 administrators, faculty members and undergraduates.

In March, 1974, the Faculty Council adopted a resolution calling for the establishment of a committee to investigate the possibilities of a women's studies program.

The committee, named by the Chancellor N. Ferbee Taylor in April, was headed by sociology department chairperson Richard Simpson. But the committee did not begin meeting regularly until December 1974, a delay Simpson said he assumes full responsibility for.

The final report, submitted to the Faculty Council in May 1975, noted several reasons for the need for a women's studies program.

First, the report stated, "There has been neglect, bias, and omission in the fields of study and traditional disciplines which include the study of women."

Joan Scott, UNC assistant history professor, said the women's studies program center on the sex roles of both men and women in present society.

The development of each individual's full capabilities should be a basic goal of any liberal arts curriculum, the report stated. The lack of discussion on women's problems prevents the establishment of a positive self-image by female students, the report stated.

Dean of Arts and Sciences James Gaskin is currently seeking a director for the program. While Gaskin was unavailable for comment, committee member Duncan MacRaw said he expects the nomination to take place within the year.

The director, working with the assistant dean of special and experimental studies, will then develop a curriculum which will probably include approximately 12 courses already offered at the university.

The student-faculty committee on women's studies proposed that no degree be offered for five years to determine whether women's studies have developed into a legitimate discipline or a passing fad.

Jamie Ellis, undergraduate member of the committee and former Association of Women Students chairperson, said she is unhappy with that aspect of the proposal. "I would have preferred to see a curriculum set up in which you could major in women's studies and minor in a specific discipline."

Financing of the program will probably come from educational grants awarded by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Ford and Woodrow Wilson Foundations, Simpson said.

West announces for Carrboro mayor

Ruth West, a former member of the Carrboro School Board and past president of the Carrboro School P.T.A., announced today she is a candidate for mayor.

West, 65, said she has been active in politics since "before I was old enough to vote." She said she decided to run for mayor at the urging of friends and because she thinks she has the time and ability to think about the issues and find solutions to problems.

"The way in which the town grows must be examined carefully to insure that the small town atmosphere is not lost," West said. "More planning is needed to guide growth, if we are to keep Carrboro a nice place."

In addition to planning, West said transportation issues, including street maintenance and the institution of a bus system would be one of her major concerns.

West said she feels the mayor's office should be open to all citizens: "The mayor must be everybody's mayor."

Two other concerns West listed are intergovernmental relations and the needs of senior citizens. She said she favors a careful study to assure maximum benefits through intergovernmental cooperation.

"Recreation for the young must not be purchased by neglect of senior citizens," she added.

A longtime Carrboro resident, West is married to Jesse Lee West. They have two children and six grandchildren.

West is a member of the Carrboro Methodist Church and works with the senior citizens program there. She also serves on the Orange County Jury Commission and has served with the Governor's Citizens Committee for Better Schools.

In addition, she is a past chairperson of the North Carrboro Democratic Precinct.

Mayor Lee calls NDP a fair success

by Johnny Oliver
Staff Writer

Chapel Hill Mayor Howard N. Lee, at a Monday morning news conference, said the town has seen a "reasonable amount of success" in its Neighborhood Development Program (NDP).

The NDP is a housing rehabilitation program subsidized primarily by the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development. Under the program, qualified low-income applicants receive loans or grants for home renovation.

Between July 1971 and June 1973, the Chapel Hill Housing Authority received $465,000 in development program funds.

Last week the authority received $190,000, raising the total amount of NDP funds since July 1973 to $840,000. The recent $190,000 allocation had been frozen by HUD until the town answered questions about its Neighborhood Development Program budget.

Qualified persons living in the NDP area are eligible for the funds. The area consists of two zones, one located in the northern section of the town and the other in the southwestern section.

Lee said the Community Development Program, begun in July 1975, will replace the NDP when it expires Dec. 31, 1975. The main difference between the two programs is that under the Community Development Program, the town will take more responsibility for directing the allocation of funds. The Neighborhood Development Program was handled mostly by HUD.

The expiring NDP has experienced several changes since its first public exposure in 1970, Lee said. "We have had to go through the process of satisfying the neighbors in allaying their fears that this was not an urban clearance program," Lee said.

"We have gone through a (housing authority) director and merged the redevelopment commission with the housing authority. And we have had to deal with the wrath of certain citizens as well as an HUD audit."

"Having been subjected to all of these things, it seems to me that we have enjoyed a reasonable amount of success at this point in time," Lee said.

The town has until Dec. 31 to complete the NDP, Lee said, and at that time, any unused portion of the NDP money will be carried over to the Community Development Program.

Lee said the town would like to see the first community development funds used in the old NDP area. "But there are other problem areas in the city of Chapel Hill, too," he added, "areas that I feel ought to be considered for some financial help."

Weekend rains ease water shortage; Village may not buy from Durham

Chances are good that Chapel Hill will not have to purchase water from Durham because of this weekend's rains, University Utilities Director Grey Culbreth said Monday.

Friday's rain, a total of 1.46 inches by noon, raised the level at University Lake, the town's water source, to 25 inches below the spillway. The lake level before the rain was more than 35 inches below the spillway.

This means 60 million gallons of water were added to the lake, Culbreth said. The additional water is approximately a 12-day supply, he said.

"We're still gaining, too," Culbreth said. "The ground is so wet now that we're still getting some water. Before, it was so dry that the vegetation absorbed it all.

"We have a good third of what we needed. Chances are very, very remote that we'll have to buy from Durham." But he said the possibility of buying from Durham cannot be ruled out, but it is much less probable.

"We're in good condition for October, a notoriously dry month," Culbreth said. The cooler weather in October should result in a drop in water consumption, he said since fewer people will be watering grass or washing cars.

The University has already arranged to buy water from Durham in case of a water shortage. Chapel Hill's last shortage was in 1973, when the University spent about $40,000 buying water from Durham.

The worst shortage occurred in 1968, when the lake level was down to 28 per cent. The lake level is now at 79 per cent, Culbreth said.

Condie checks Title IX in D.C.

University Housing Director James D. Condie is in Washington, D.C., this week to ask federal officials how much the housing department should conform to the dictates of Title IX.

Title IX is a part of the 1972 Omnibus Education Act which renders illegal any discrimination on the basis of sex in government-supported educational institutions.

Housing may be forced to change a high-quality women's hall into a men's hall and a lower quality men's hall into a women's hall, in order to equalize campus housing opportunities.

The guidelines the housing department received from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare this summer were unclear, according to Programming Coordinator Doris Kaneklides.

She said Condie's trip is to clarify the guidelines, to set an immediate course and "to find out how demanding HEW will be in setting definite deadlines" for any equalizing programs Housing might be required to enact.

Kaneklides ruled out the possibility of building a new, high-quality men's hall. She said it would be more likely to switch a men's and a women's residence hall.

Condie will report his findings to Donald A. Boulton, dean of student affairs, and John Temple, assistant vice-chancellor for business affairs, when the housing director returns later this week.
