

Housing to be probed by SCAU

by Bob King
Staff Writer

An investigation into the operations and efficiency of the Department of University Housing has been undertaken by the Student Consumer Action Union (SCAU). "Basically, we're doing the study because nobody really knows much about the department and how it works, even though so many students have a direct involvement with it," SCAU member Brad Lamb said last Wednesday.

Areas to be investigated are the housing departments' objectives, services, employment practices, budget, buildings, inner working and rules for staff; relationships with students, Student Government and its own staff; and efficiency.

"We want to relay some specific information to students they've never had before," he said.

Lamb said students have misconceptions in the area of campus housing, "and we'd like to provide some straight answers."

One misconception is the negative view students have of Housing Director James Condie, Lamb said. "He's often blamed for things that he has nothing to do with. We won't defend him, just try to explain some things."

Condie said he thinks the study is "a good idea, particularly if they can articulate a lot of information back to the students."

The study might "help us to see if there are other things that need to be done in housing," he said.

Currently, SCAU is collecting information about all aspects of the housing department from admissions, Physical Plant and utilities officials as well as from the housing department itself.

Past studies of the department have been hampered by reliance on the housing department alone as an information source, Lamb said.

Lee Wallace, executive assistant of the Residence Hall Association (RHA) was enthusiastic about the study. "We'll do all we can to help out," Wallace said. "I think they're out to get the facts."

Lamb could not predict a deadline for the study's report, but he said the study's conclusions will be held for that final report, instead of being released during the course of the study.

How comprehensive the study will depend largely upon the number of volunteers SCAU can enlist, Lamb said. "We might just have to drop a big area of the study if we don't have the manpower, or if we don't consider it worth the effort."

SCAU conducted a similar investigation of Student Stores last year in which charges of mismanagement were proved incorrect.

Governors form planning group

South campus dorm governors have formed an informal organization this semester to plan social and academically-oriented activities. Morrison governor Bill Fairbanks said Monday.

Fairbanks said that although he and some friends had jokingly proposed the organization as an alternative to the Residence Hall Association (RHA) early in the semester, the informal group that resulted from the proposal is not dissatisfied with RHA.

RHA is "doing fine as far as its responsibilities go," he said. The group is not in competition with RHA, he explained, but is needed in addition to it.

The group is composed of the governors of James, Morrison and Ehringhaus dorms.

The first joint social activity the group planned was the South Campus party held Oct. 11 in the Ramshead parking lot.

Fairbanks said the group is now considering holding an all-campus Spring music festival. All dorm governments will be asked to help plan the festival.

Plans for a South Campus lecture series and a movie series are also being considered by the group.

Condie to spend night in James

That big fellow with the grey afro and the toothy grin hanging around 632 James tonight will be none other than the big boss himself, University Housing Director Jim Condie.

At the invitation of James residence assistant Mike Womack and the remainder of the James staff, Condie will spend the night in James to experience for himself the trials and tribulations of living in University Housing.

Condie will be in the room beginning at 8:30 p.m. to meet James residents and hear questions and suggestions.

Along with Deans James Cansler and Donald Boulton of the Department of Student Life and Chancellor N. Ferebee Taylor, Condie spent a night in a Winston room in the fall 1973, when more than 500 rooms across campus were overcrowded.

That visit turned into a late night party, and Condie said Monday he hopes he "has the strength" to get through this one.

Lee

Despite Lee's organizing attempts, he seems to trail Akins, who said last Friday that he has made contact in 45 counties. "We've done more work than the other candidates," said Akins with the handshaking, backslapping demeanor of a political office-seeker.

To stage a successful attempt at the lieutenant governorship, Lee has estimated that he will need between $200,000 and $300,000. And he is outwardly confident that he can collect it.

But, many politicians and political observers say that finances will be a problem for most candidates.

Ben Utley, executive director of the state Democratic Party, said financial problems will thin the ranks of candidates for all public offices. "The Democratic Party may have up to 16 candidates for lieutenant governor and four for governor," he said. "There's just not that much money to go around."

Along with Akins, Green, Jordan, Lee and Marions, other potential candidates are state Sen. Herbert Hyde, D-Buncombe; state Rep. Glenn Jernigan, D-Cumberland; state Sen. Herman Moore, D-Mecklenburg; and Frank Stevenson Jr., Chowan College director of admissions.

Of the potential candidates, Lee said, Sens. Moore and Marion may drop out of the race.

While Marion did not mention quitting the race, Moore, when interviewed last week, left his options open. But he didn't seem to fully intend to run.

Although Moore said he "would like to be president of the Senate (one of the lieutenant governor's duties)," he noted that Wake Commissioner Akins will probably be the party's nominee.

"The only person who is really in it (the race) is Waverly," Moore said. "I just don't think Lee could beat the opposition."

"I don't think Hyde has the political base to win lieutenant governor. He's very competent, but he has no charisma."

One Raleigh YDC member disagreed, Hyde "has a combination of intelligence and style. When he walks into a room, you just know he's someone special."

Of the potential lieutenant governor candidates, "Lee is the most competent," Moore said. "But I think he will have financial problems. His race will also get in the way."

Mayor Lee agrees that his race will be considered by the voters and members of the party, and at a recent meeting of the UNC Young Democrats Club he said that being black could both help and hurt his bid. "I will have a higher degree of visibility statewide, but I'm sure that it will hurt me in the votes," said Lee, the first black mayor of a predominantly white southern town.

When interviewed earlier this year, Lee said he wanted to de-emphasize race in the campaign. "If my opponents want to make it an issue, it will be their issue."

So far, none of the potential candidates have made it an issue. And, if the Wake County YDC meeting and the Duplin County rally are any indication of the sympathy toward Lee's campaign, little note is being taken of skin color.

What is noticed is the things he says and how he says them.

He speaks with seeming confidence, without a text, and walks he through the gatherings with apparent ease.

But as he drove away from the Young Democrats meeting in Raleigh, the mayor said, "Damned if I didn't feel like I was coming across lousy up there."

"You really get psyched up for one of these things," Lee said. "But you just have to keep it down, keep it slow. I have to pace myself; not go full blast."

Likewise, in his speech to the Wake YDC, Lee did not go full blast. In fact, he eased subtly, though not imperceptibly into the campaign talk.

Beginning his speech by calling this a "tremendously changing time," Lee said, "It's been the best of times and the worst of times. I've seen despair, loss of hope; seen the frustration of not knowing which public official the people can trust."

Changing tacks slightly, he then said, "Now is the time to present issues with clear answers. It's time to face up to controversy, to improve the lives of people."

Finally, after naming some problems faced by the state, the candidate said, "It's not secret that I am intending or planning or thinking about running for lieutenant governor. I'm serious because I believe that this is the time to do something worthwhile for the state. I'm serious because I believe that here and now I can win."

To the UNC Young Democrats last week he named three reasons for running for lieutenant governor. "I'm a realist and I realize that the situation and atmosphere in this state will not permit me to be elected as governor," he said.

Also, "I feel there are many things that can be done as lieutenant governor. And thirdly, I love impossible challenges."

But in actuality, Lee doesn't think he will lose his bid for the democratic nomination. Lee thinks his experience in local government will help him gain statewide support because of the trend toward governmental decentralization. Today, there is more action going on from the state to the local level. More emphasis is placed on the local level, and that's where I have my experience."

Why then is he leaving local government to seek a post in Raleigh? First, his six years as Chapel Hill's mayor have been enough and he is apparently satisfied with his accomplishments as mayor.

But also, as Broom put it, Lee sees the decentralization trend as also transferring power from the federal government to the states.

Even in this respect, other candidates' experience with state government will not hurt his campaign but may help, Lee said, since the present state government is a "caretaker administration."

Lee and party members do not have many kind words for the administration in Washington either. "The Democratic Party gave us the New Deal, the People's Deal and the Fair Deal," Lee said. "But the Republican Party has given us the Raw Deal."

Democrats should "join hands and elect Democrats from the White House to the court house," Lee continued. "The Democratic Party is the last hope for society."

Lee's devotion to the Democratic Party will certainly help his bid for the Democratic nomination, Broom said. "He's really accepted as an important fixture in the party."

Akins was not as oriented toward party

Correction

The time of the Third World Supper to be held in conjunction with the Fast for a World Harvest was incorrectly reported in the Daily Tar Heel Monday. The supper will be held at 6 p.m. Thursday, Nov. 20 at the Wesley Foundation rather than 8 p.m. as reported.

unity when he spoke to the gathering at the Duplin County rally, but he was looking toward the campaign. After announcing that North Carolina has the lowest industrial wages of any state and that state education simply "doesn't stand up," Akins said, "We need to talk about what we can be."

But Lee said later, "He's not going to make any friends now with that sort of (negative) speech."

But despite the campaign rhetoric which filled some speeches by lieutenant governor and gubernatorial candidates, the Duplin County Democrats left the rally in apparent unity for a dance at a local country club.

Anxious to rest, Lee passed up the dance (although he follows the directional philosophy) and hit the road for the three-hour trip to Chapel Hill.
