Hearst testifies on robbery

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) Patricia Hearst testified Monday that she joined a bank robbery as a member of a terrorist band because her life had been threatened hundreds of times and that later she did not flee because she thought her kidnapers or the FBI would kill her.

Her testimony was her first public account of life underground with the Symbionese Liberation Army terrorists who kidnaped her two years ago.

The defense called the 21-year-old defendant to the stand outside the presence of the jury to back up objection to introduction of evidence about tape recordings and events during the 19 months after the April, 1974, bank robbery with which she is charged.

Defense lawyer F. Lee Bailey sought to show that the recordings were made under duress.

Azar discusses foreign policy

by Teddy Goldman Staff Writer

United States foreign policy will soon become insufficient to serve American needs unless it begins to account for three emerging world trends, UNC political science Prof. Edward E. Azar said last week.

Addressing a meeting of the Dialectic and Philanthropic Societies, Azar listed three crucial developments he said current U.S. foreign policy does not consider:

· Growing awareness over the finiteness of world resources: · Dealing with injustice and inequality in the third world, and · Developing minority group consciousness in many countries.

"A foreign policy that does not address itself to these problems is a foreign policy that will simply compound our previous problems," Azar said.

The traditional foreign policy of the 1950's and 60's was basically security oriented and arms race oriented, Azar said. He added that continuation of such an exhaustive foreign policy today is unjustified, because it is transcended by the new idea of resource Resource exhaustion "is as strong a reality as (that of) Communism as a competitive force," he said.

Contending that our present foreign policy is essentially the same as it was from 1947 to 1967, Azar said it is "stupid to argue that a great deal has changed.

"We may be led to believe that the Cold War, in all its most fundamental characteristics, has disappeared, but actually very little has changed between the U.S. and Soviet Union except (that it is now) a verbal cold war," he said.

Only the style of U.S.-Soviet relations has changed, Azar said, since the two countries are still in an arms race, one of the most distinguishing features of the Cold War.

Asked why the U.S. and the Soviet Union continue to produce nuclear weapons when we already have an overkill capacity, Azar said that it is "insane to ever argue (that) you can measure the impact of nuclear weapons. Nobody knows the impact. It's only psychological."

Azar said he did not know what a viable foreign policy program would look like, but he added that it must be a "foreign policy that pays attention to the constraints of resources, a less injust world, and a more developed world." He said this type of foreign policy is not only cheaper and better.

but necessary as well. Foreign policy in a small country is easy to change, Azar said, but in this country, with its many different interest groups, change takes time and may not even occur. The University, he added, in one realm in which

Voter registration deadline nears

The deadline for registering to vote in the March 23 presidential primaries is quickly approaching.

By Feb. 23, all Democrats must be registered in order to vote in the Democratic Presidential Primary and all Republicans must be registered for the Republican Presidential Primary.

Also on March 23, all voters will decide a referendum on a statewide $43 million bond issue to finance UNC construction projects, including a new women's gymnasium at UNC-CH. They will also vote on two constitutional amendments.

North Carolina that bristled at the idea.

On Dec. 12, 1974, Gov. James E. Holshouser submitted to the Interior Department the plan to incorporate North Carolina's 26.5-mile segment of the New River into the National Wild Scenic River

Under the federal Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, a state may petition the executive branch to have a river within its borders protected by the act, which states that FPC may not license a hydroelectric project on a river included in the system.

Assistant Secretary Arthur Cooper of the state Department of Natural and Economic Resources (NER) explained the state's opposition to the Blue Ridge Project last week as a "matter of principle," adding, "We are opposed to that particular project because the social disruption will be more than the benefit to North Carolina.

John S. Curry, Carrboro lawyer and legal counsel to the Committee for the New River. said last week that "the New River wouldn't be anywhere now without the state."

State government is free to combat the Blue Ridge Project mainly because it involves an out-of-state utility company with no political influence in Raleigh, Curry said.

On the grounds that FPC issued the license to take effect after the state began the petition process, North Carolina appealed FPC's decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D. C. The suit also contested that FPC's environmental impact statement on the project was inadequate, Curry said.

Last October the court ordered that the project be delayed until it reached a final

The fate of the New River has also been the subject of a Congressional debate. In the fall of 1974, members of the North Carolina delegation sponsored an unsuccessful bill authorizing the Interior Department to study the river for possible inclusion in the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System.

North Carolina Republican Sen. Jesse Helms and Democrat Rep. Stephen L. Neal are currently sponsoring a bill that would mandatorily include the New River in the national system.

These attempts to block the Blue Ridge Project have prolonged uncertainty on the future of the New River for thirteen years. yet they may not end with Kleppe's decision.
