Most students are returning to Chapel Hill from breaks that probably seemed either far too brief or agonizingly long and dull, depending on where they were spent. No vacation is perfect.

During the inter-session, we stumbled upon a number of interesting things.

news

Once a stalker, always a stalker

Former Carolina head cheerleader, "Rabbit" Giles, was arrested in Raleigh for assault with intent to commit rape. (See story page 3.) Giles allegedly jumped from behind a bush on the N.C. State campus wearing only socks and mazola oil.

That's what a Carolina education can do for you.

perspective

New river controversy flows on

What was once only a meandering river in northwestern North Carolina is now a major political fight between the environmentalists and the power company interests. Tar Heel Washington correspondent, Greg Porter, takes a look at the new developments on page 5.

features

Friend or foul?

In the spring, New Yorkers who live along Central Park close their windows and hold their noses. The dog dung that has collected there all winter is thawing.

Health officials here are now alarmed, however, that the refuse may do more than just smell bad. It may pose serious health hazards to humans. Concerned by the health risks, the University is considering banning stray dogs from campus and requiring leashes for the rest. (See story page 8.)

Reform reformed

When the Federal Corrections Institute at Butner was on the drawing board, its designers envisioned it as a revolutionary experiment in criminal rehabilitation. It would be a "prison without bars," a sort of life-size

Skinnerian laboratory that would "turn losers into winners."

Now, several years later, the Butner Institute is still a prison without bars, but not at all the behavior modifier its planners imagined. (See story page 9.)

In other stories this issue...

The Legislature legislates. Tony Waldrop looks for a tennis partner and staff critics Birnam Wood and Dunse Inane gorge themselves on Darryl's fare.

The summer Tar Heel will be published once a week on Thursdays during both sessions of summer school and will be distributed to the following sites: the Union, Y-Court, Winston, Alexander, Granville Towers, Connor and Cobb dorms, the Student Health Service, Carolina Coffee Shop and Jeff's Confectionary.
