Big Apple goes rotten

MANCHESTER, N.H. (UPI)—Ira Royer and at least three other New Hampshire residents have another name for New York City—The Rotten Apple.

Royer, 54, received a $275 bill from New York City for traffic violations last year. He has not driven in New York City in more than 25 years.

"I took my son down there when he was three so I could see an old Army buddy," he said. "My son is 29 now." Royer's dilemma was detailed in his local newspaper and he's since learned others share his predicament.

"I've got calls from three different people who have the same problem I have," he said. "One guy in Derry got a bill for $500, another in Manchester for $40 and a third in Littleton for $175."

Hours lowered for double majors

by Laura Scism
Staff Writer

Double majors no longer need 129 credit hours to graduate, according to Fred Vogler, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Students can now earn a double-major notation on their transcripts by taking a minimum of 120 credit hours, the same requirement for single-major students, Vogler said.

A double major is noted only on a student's transcript and not on his diploma.

But Vogler emphasized that the liberalized credit-hour policy may not apply to all students double majoring. Students in highly structured A.B. degree programs, such as the natural sciences, might need to take extra courses to fulfill the requirements of both major departments, he said.

"We don't guarantee this (120 hours)," Vogler said. "This is the bare minimum below which you can't go."

Most double majors, however, will be able to graduate with less than the previously required 129 hours, he said.

To double major, a student must meet General College requirements, then take six to eight courses in both his first and second majors, plus five courses allied and five nondivisional to the first major.

Only the College of Arts and Sciences and the School of Journalism permit students to double major. Students earning B.S. degrees may not double major.

To determine individual graduation requirements, Vogler said each double major should have his adviser complete a double-major analysis sheet.

"The adviser should be running this projection rather than the student himself,"

Vogler said. "Someone who doesn't know what a divisional elective is could botch it up."

He said that in the past, many students have needed extra hours to graduate because they failed to plan their courses carefully in advance. The analysis sheet will not be completed unless requested by a student.

The new double-major policy, which took effect this fall, also requires students to secure written approval of their double-major proposal from both departments.

This allows the second major department to claim the student as a major and also gives professors a chance to discuss the student's reasons for double majoring, Vogler said.

The original 129-hour requirement for double majors was adopted when both math and a foreign language were General College requirements. At that time, a double major was not possible unless a student took nine extra hours. The liberalized policy reflects changes in the General College curriculum adopted in the early 1970s, Vogler said.
