

Ban on swine flu shots may be removed today

by David Stacks
Staff Writer

Federal health officials will decide Friday if the nationwide swine flu inoculation moratorium is to be lifted. The program was halted Dec. 16 after 10 persons who received the flu shot died of the Guillian-Barre Syndrome, a muscular paralysis.

No cases of either swine flu or Guillian-Barre Syndrome have been reported among UNC students or in Orange County.

Almost 4,300 persons, or 20 per cent of the UNC student body, has been inoculated against either the New Jersey or Victoria swine flu strains. In Orange County, approximately 15,000 persons, or 25 per cent, have received a swine flu shot.

Approximately 908,000 North Carolinians, or 18 per cent of the state's population, have received a flu shot. Almost 45 million, or 31 per cent, have been inoculated nationwide.

"Compared to the number of people who have taken the shot, the number of reported Guillian-Barre cases is very insignificant," said Betty Hooper, public information officer of the Federal Center for Disease Control's Atlanta office.

"I don't think the program will continue again," said a spokesperson for Parke-Davis Drug Manufacturers, a producer of the flu vaccine. "If there was a real danger of swine flu, the government would probably reinstate the program."

Four North Carolinians who received flu shots contracted Guillian-Barre Syndrome. The victims included three women, ages 21, 42 and 86, and a 44-year-old man.

Only the 21-year-old woman has completely recovered.

"There is no specific test for Guillian-Barre in the swine flu vaccine because no one is really all that positive what causes Guillian-Barre," the Parke-Davis spokesperson said.

Symptoms of Guillian-Barre begin with diarrhea and vomiting. The victim loses sensation in his legs. The loss of sensation becomes a paralysis and moves upward in the body. The illness settles in the victim's lungs, opening the way for respiratory infection.

North Carolina normally expects 50 to 100 cases of Guillian-Barre Syndrome per year, Dr. J.N. MacCormack, director of the state Health Service, said. He said the number of cases associated with the swine flu program is not of epidemic proportions.

Telephone mania. . . . If long distance is the next best thing to being there, ninth floor Granville resident Doug Fuller almost visited with a Playboy bunny and Uganda's head of state.

Fuller said he and some friends called Katrina Hegg who appears in February's Playboy. They found Hegg's Colorado telephone number through long distance information. "I said hello from me and all the guys and told her that we liked her in the magazine."

"She said thanks and was pretty nice about it," Fuller said. Earlier in the week, Fuller tried to call Uganda's Idi Amin. A guy on Fuller's hall had Amin's phone number so Fuller called the long distance operator who connected him with the overseas operator who said she would call back.

The overseas operator called back to tell Fuller that she had tried two different lines but all lines to Uganda were busy. He said that he may call again if he can "get people to chip in to pay the charge."

Horsing around. . . . Of the many Carolina fans horsing around at the Peach Bowl Game in Atlanta, one four-legged fan lost his self-control and caused plenty of trouble.

Jesse Basnight Jr., a Chapel Hill resident, was leaving the stadium when a horse and his policeman rider galloped out of control and into Basnight's car.

The police were unloading horses on Capitol Street when the accident occurred. The mounted police are used for riot control.

As Basnight turned onto Capitol Street, the horse ran into his car. The policeman riding the horse was thrown down, and the horse fell on him.

The horse was not hurt but the policeman was sent to the hospital. Basnight's car suffered $250 damage.

"It was a very scary experience because it was such a spur of the moment thing," Basnight said. "It was as if the game wasn't bad enough."

Pretty Chick. . . . Being selected the 1977 Poultry Queen has meant suffering a few jokes about the title, but the $1,000 scholarship has helped endure the teasing, according to Chris Blanton, a sophomore, who was chosen queen in September.

As an official representative of the N.C. Poultry Federation, Blanton will attend a variety of activities few other beauty queens participate in.

She will attend the world's largest poultry gathering, the Southeastern Poultry and Egg Show in Atlanta and appear at a chicken cook in Raleigh.

"Occasionally, the other girls will joke and call me Miss Chicken," Blanton said.

She said she entered the contest in hopes of winning the scholarship. Her parents are not involved in the poultry industry.

Eleven other girls entered the contest. Most were from cities with a large poultry industry.

Morris's Cat. . . . Did you ever wonder what it would be like to keep a pet in a dorm? If you have, then ask fourth floor Grimes residents about Pete.

Pete was a Blue Maltese cat that Grimes Resident Advisor Craig Morris kept for four weeks.

Morris said, "He wasn't that much of a problem until after exams." It was then that Pete went climbing around on a shelf, knocking down a stereo speaker and breaking it. After Pete broke the speaker, Morris decided the cat would not be back for the second semester.

Pete was evidently a very amiable feline. "Everyone liked him and were kind of disappointed when I didn't bring him back," Morris said.
