UNC avoids driver issue

by Chris Fuller
Staff Writer

Even though it is against University regulations, freshman students do keep cars on campus, and little is done to stop them.

"We don't take any action here on freshmen having cars," said William Locke, Administrative Director of Traffic and Motor Vehicle Registration.

Because of the regulation, Locke said freshmen could not have their cars registered or get parking permits. He added that exceptions are sometimes made under special circumstances.

Locke said the regulation used to be enforced by the University, but he added "These last few years, they seem to be more lax about it than they used to be."

"Personally, I don't think the University really cares who has cars."

The nonenforcement of permits is as far as the traffic department goes in enforcing the no-cars-for-freshmen regulation, Locke said. The rule against freshmen having cars is an Honor Code violation and is not mentioned in University traffic ordinances, he said.

Student Government's Transportation Director Paul Arne said enforcement of the regulation is almost impossible. "It is very difficult to look at a license plate to find out if it belongs to a freshman."

But Arnes said the University is not considering lifting the restriction on freshmen with cars. "They don't have enough spaces for the people who park now," he said.

The spaces available for freshmen to park are slowly diminishing, Arne said. The prohibition of parking on Manning Drive between 15-501 and Hinton-James Dormitory is the most recent example, he said.

Locke said, however, he did not think all the parking on Manning Drive was done by freshmen. He said the majority of cars parked there belonged to dorm residents and commuters.

He said that during first semester when parking on Manning was permitted, there were 100 to 150 S4 and S5 parking permits left, but the permits have sold out since parking on Manning was banned.

Arne said there are still spaces available for freshman parking. He listed the residential areas around Cameron and Rosemary Streets, the municipal lots adjacent to the NCNB Plaza and apartment lots.

He added that Chapel Hill is trying to discourage parking on residential streets and long-term parking in the municipal lots.

The town is considering making residential streets into either no-parking zones or into metered zones, Arne said. "They are very interested in that." He said the idea is being studied by the city attorney.

The town has already doubled the parking rate after two hours at the municipal lots, Arne said. "What they are economically trying to do is stop long-term parking" in the business district.

New budget excludes N.C. State vet school

by Merton Vance
Staff Writer

The budget request of the UNC Board of Governors differs sharply with the budget proposals of the advisory budget commission, and Gov. James B. Hunt, Jr., and the N.C. State University veterinary school may suffer as a result.

The school has been in planning and development stages for three years and was scheduled to open in 1981.

Raymond H. Dawson, Vice President for Academic Affairs for the UNC General Administration, said some of the major differences between the Board of Governors' request and the advisory budget commission recommendations are in the area of faculty salaries, capital improvements and current operations.

The Board of Governors requested a 10 per cent faculty salary increase for each of the two years covered by the budget.

The advisory budget commission recommends a 6.5 per cent faculty salary increase the first year and makes no recommendation for the second year. Since there is no recommendation for the second year, there would probably be another budget session later to decide on salary increases for 1978.

Hunt, in his budget message to the legislature, said he wants to increase salaries but did not say exactly how much.

Faculty members are expected to request the full salary increase and are getting ready to lobby for it.

Dawson said that the salary requests had been a top priority item in the budget request. "I wish they had recommended the 10 per cent increase. It certainly is needed," Dawson said.

There is also a sharp cut in the budget requests for capital improvements in the 16-campus university system.

"In capital improvements there's an enormous difference," Dawson said.

The advisory budget commission has recommended $3 million for building renovation and construction during the first year of the biennium. The Board of Governors requested over $179 million for 13 different capital improvement projects.

Dawson also said the current operations recommendation from the advisory budget commission differs considerably from the Board of Governors' request. The board asked for approximately $29 million in the first year of the biennium to cover such items as program changes, enrollment changes and library improvements. The advisory budget commission recommends $19.3 million for those projects during the first year.

Dawson said the Board of Governors will probably be considering supplemental budget requests in the near future in hopes of getting more money.

The budget recommendations made by Hunt and the advisory budget commission are not final and are subject to debate and change by the legislature.

The NCSU veterinary school has many supporters in the General Assembly, and one NCSU official said he expects legislators to challenge the budget recommendations when they come before the House and Senate for debate.

Prof. William M. Caldwell, a professor at the NCSU veterinary department, said some of the veterinary school supporters will probably try to get more money for the school. "Of course, that would be their prerogative, but it would not surprise me at all," Caldwell said.

News show spurs hospital to search files

by Jaci Hughes
Staff Writer

The North Carolina Memorial Hospital (NCMH) began searching its files Monday for patients who received radiation treatment as children in the 1930s and 40s for benign diseases such as inflamed thyroid glands, swollen tonsils, and acne. According to CBS's "60 Minutes" program, seven per cent of those persons who received such treatment have developed thyroid cancer.

The "60 Minutes" program, aired Sunday evening, criticized hospitals for not conducting a search for the patients involved.

Dr. Edward Rogoff, director of radiation therapy at NCMH said, "It wasn't like nobody knew about this before."

According to Rogoff, a program to search for the patients in North Carolina began Jan. 4 when the N.C. Medical Society formed a task force to handle the identification and location of these patients in the state.

Rogoff said that the search has turned up only 10 people who were treated in NCMH. Rogoff said that he doubts many more patients are involved.

"Memorial Hospital opened in 1952. By the 1950s much radiation for benign disease had been abandoned because we didn't need it."

Rogoff cautioned that persons who believe they may have been exposed to this type of treatment should not panic. "This type of cancer is not the type you get one day and are killed the next day. It is very, very slow growing. Most of the people who get it are cured."

Rogoff said that the treatment was used because, "It was very simple to do, and it appeared to have good results with no side effects. Now we know that it did have side effects."

Rogoff said that the type of treatment used then is very different from that used today to treat cancer victims. "I don't even know if they knew what doses they were using. Also, today we can treat a tonsil without affecting the person's thyroid gland or any other part of his body."

"Rogoff stressed the benefits of radiation therapy in treating cancer victims. "We treat 50 to 70 people a day here. We relieve their pain or help cure their disease through radiation therapy. It is a very powerful tool for treating cancer, and I don't want people to get the idea that radiation is bad."

"It's a double-edged sword. It can do bad, and it can also do great good," Rogoff said.
