Nuremberg still valid: Kaufman

by Laura Scism
Staff Writer

Principles established at the Nuremberg war-crime trials 30 years ago are still applicable today, said Mary Kaufman, one of the prosecuting attorneys at the Nuremberg trials.

Speaking Monday night to a group of approximately 100 persons in the Great Hall, Kaufman explained the principles of Nuremberg and related them to Vietnam war draft resisters and the Wilmington 10 case in North Carolina.

The Nuremberg principles, she said, declared that initiating, planning and waging war is an international crime; that individuals are responsible for their actions even if under orders of higher government officials; and that complicity in any war crime is itself a crime.

"We have the responsibility not to be accomplices in the criminal conduct of our government," Kaufman said. "We have to speak out and make our demands, and that's the meaning of Nuremberg."

She described the Wilmington 10 as "people whose only criminal conduct was to fight for the rights of black people."

Preventing repression, she said, "starts here at home. We have a responsibility to express ourselves in the Wilmington 10 case."

Kaufman said the Nuremberg trials were held to establish a set of rules that would deter war and to establish a punishment for those who waged war.

The focus of the group will be on communicating better with others, dealing more effectively with feelings, and feeling better about oneself. An emphasis will be placed on learning how to make use of each other for support and a group screening interview with Jim Whiteside or Nancy Voight.

Draft may resume, warns Rogers

WASHINGTON (UPI)—Army Chief of Staff Bernard Rogers said Tuesday the nation might have to resume the draft to offset future manpower shortages and indicated present standby draft machinery could not meet the needs of a European war.

The general told a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on European defenses that American units are now "outgunned" in some respects, and Soviet bloc troops "directly facing NATO are, in the main, more ready than NATO defense forces."

Rogers answered questions on whether—as some members of Congress now believe—the nation will need to return to the draft system scrapped in 1973.

He did not link the potential need for a new draft with the present all-volunteer active army, but with shortages of Army reserve force manpower.

Organized reserve units are 80,000 men below their peacetime manning goals, Rogers said.

"If we cannot fill these reserve components, then very serious consideration must be given to implementation of Selective Service," he said.

The two-year period that starts with the next budget, Oct. 1, he said, will be "critical" in determining whether manpower needs can be met without the draft.

Rogers said NATO could have as little as 24 hours warning time in the event of any sudden Soviet bloc attack on Western Europe, "although my personal opinion is that we would have around 14 days."

Warnke selection attacked

WASHINGTON (UPI)—Paul Warnke, President Carter's controversial choice as chief U.S. arms negotiator, acknowledged Tuesday his top secret copy of the Pentagon Papers found its way into the hands of Daniel Ellsberg who leaked it to the press in 1971.

But Warnke told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he never anticipated Ellsberg would try to get the document.

Warnke went before the committee with a ringing endorsement from Carter who told a news conference he saw no conflict between his own views of arms reduction and those of Warnke.

"I think when the members of the Senate consider what Mr. Warnke stands for, he will be approved overwhelmingly," Carter said.

He said the present standby draft system would take an estimated 110 days to get the first draftee to a training center and 210 days to a unit.

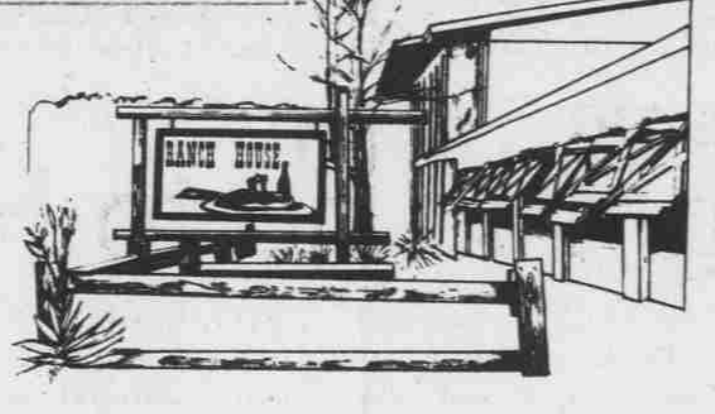

"We would prefer that it might be quicker than that," he said. "We would prefer 30 days to get him into the training command."

Warnke's nomination drew criticism from conservatives who said his record indicated he might lean toward making one-sided arms reductions without winning similar cutbacks from the Russians.

Warnke testified he had transferred the papers to a high security vault at the Rand Corporation after he left the Johnson Administration during which he served as an assistant secretary of defense.

In answer to questions by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, he said Ellsberg obtained the copy because "security requirements were not abided by." He said two former aides, Morton Halperin and Leslie Gelb, jointly authorized access to the documents for Ellsberg.

Happy the Man: Catch 'Em Now, Tomorrow They'll Be Stars

The Carolina Union is hoping to develop Chapel Hill as a place for musicians looking for fame. A new concept will be tried in the first of, hopefully, a series of shows. Admission to the hall is free, and after the show, the crowd will be asked to donate however much money they felt the show was worth.

Happy the Man's music can best be described as progressive, taking influences from the classical, rock, jazz, and acoustic styles, with mostly English roots. A light show accompanies Happy the Man to reconstruct each song visually.

There's a great feeling involved when one sees or hears a group before they become famous. There will be a bunch of people around D.C. who will have that feeling after Happy the Man goes big. Your chance is here - what do you have to lose?

Appearing On Campus:

Friday Feb. 11 8:00 p.m.
