dorm repairs

"Windows have been knocked out of the end doors in Everett, and some furniture has been messed up," Brueckner said. "Several years ago, the guys used to line up tables in front of the TB room window and slide people across them and out through the screen. We have an active dorm."

Practical jokes can get to be pretty expensive. Materials and labor are expensive, and any repairs that are made are paid for from the housing budget.

"One problem is that most students don't think housing shows much concern for dorm improvements," Personette said. "Maybe if the dorms were in nicer condition people would be more inclined to take good care of them."

Kathy McSweeney, a Joyner resident, concurs with the feeling that housing "is a department way out there that doesn't even care." Room sign-up strengthens this impression, McSweeney said.

"Agitation and perseverance get things done" Kathy Tilley claims. "I kept badgering people until we finally got the improvements we wanted on our floor."

Tilley also said many things are being done outside of the housing department by students who are willing to work to make things better.

A limited maintenance staff is a hindrance in making daily repairs, Kossoff said. Carpenter Billy Taylor and plumber Jesse Ennis agreed with this assessment of the situation. "What it boils down to," Taylor said, "is that we are short-handed and way behind."

"Students complain to us because we haven't fixed something. They don't seem to realize that we have to handle emergencies first," Ennis said.

"One girl has been writing me love notes telling me how stupid I am because I haven't fixed her sink yet," Taylor said.

A fundamental problem in getting things done involves what Kossoff called "a lack of coordination and communication among different levels in the department. You ask for an improvement and then you don't hear whether anything is being done or not."

"People in the (housing) office don't know what's going on in the buildings," according to Billy Taylor.

"You learn to be patient and roll with the punches," Kossoff said, "pushing when you think it will help" (in dealing with the housing office).

Perry said he works hard at keeping communication lines open, "both vertically and horizontally," among the 121 people in the department. "Supervisory meetings are held with people from all levels for the purpose of establishing priorities, and memos from the office keep people informed of what is going on."

The difficulty office personnel face in keeping track of repairs on 1,593,279 square feet in 29 dorms is understandable. This large area must be covered by a relatively small maintenance staff. Given these conditions, coupled with the rising cost of repair materials (which in turn lead to rising room rents), students need to be aware of the procedure for both large and small repairs in order to help the system work for them.
