Alger Hiss

During his speech and in an interview Wednesday, Hiss commented on his trial, his attempt to clear his name and his impressions of the personalities involved.

Hiss is seeking a writ of coram nobis, which is issued by the court when a case involves improper action by the prosecution. Evidence Hiss has been able to obtain from FBI files shows that the FBI withheld evidence that would have shown him innocent.

He recounted the events of his testimony before HUAC. "The main thing I remember is the Kafka-like quality of the hearings. The TV lights were so bright I couldn't see the questioners. I remember having the impression that I was one runner going against a relay team."

"The committee had the information it wanted. From my point of view, they were simply trying to badger me and distort the facts."

Whittaker Chambers, an ex-Communist who made the charges against Hiss, was "a pathetic creature who was used by Nixon and the FBI." Chambers changed his story several times during the hearings and trials and admitted perjury. He was protected from prosecution by testifying against Hiss.

Also immune from prosecution was Julian Wadleigh, a State Department employee who admitted giving Chambers the documents attributed to Hiss.

And what of Nixon, who once said, "If the American people knew the real character of Alger Hiss they would boil him in oil?"

"He didn't know my real character," Hiss said.

Hiss said that Nixon's importance as a cause for his prosecution is overestimated. "The main thing Nixon did was prejudice public opinion. He was a political opportunist."

Hiss said he is not bitter about the conviction that ended his political career. The only bitterness he feels is toward the late J. Edgar Hoover, FBI Director at the time of the trial. "Hoover was close to being a monster about repressing evidence. He was not subject to free public observation."
