'Navy showers' not taken in dorms

By WILL JONES
Staff Writer

Dorm residents recently interviewed say they are aware of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro water shortage, and they are trying to conserve, but they admit dorm water conservation efforts are less evident than last year.

"I don't believe that it's critical anymore, but it's still necessary to conserve," says senior Richard Lyman of 104 Winston. "I take a 'navy shower' everyday, and I try not to run the faucets as much." Many dorm residents say the most commonly practiced method of conservation is flushing toilets less often. But they say students still take long showers and allow water to run, whereas last year they would have turned it off.

"I believe that there's a shortage, but people around here feel the town had a year to act upon it and nothing visible has been done," says senior Steve Allen of 826 Morrison.

AWS gets money from CGC, planning bigger winter festival

By JULIANNE KNIGHT
Staff Writer

The Association for Women Students (AWS) and its proposed week-long women's festival are under increasing pressure to succeed now that the Campus Governing Council (CGC) has appropriated an additional $4,000 to be spent solely on the project, CGC member Chip Cox said Wednesday.

"AWS is going to have to show CGC that a significant section of the University is being served by this, and if not, they are going to have to explain why not," Cox said. "The credibility of the organization is laying on the line."

In a meeting Tuesday night, the CGC allocated the funds from its general surplus. This appropriation is in addition to the initial women's festival appropriation of $1,800.

But the $5,800 AWS now has to bring speakers, films, exhibits and performers to UNC for the festival Jan. 22-28 is only part of the estimated total cost of the event. The festival may cost as much as $14,000.

Thus, AWS itself must raise most of the money for the festival.

Jay Sharpe, chairperson of the women's festival committee, assured CGC that AWS could raise money through the sale of tickets to festival events, Cox said. "If they don't raise the money, they will have trouble getting funds from CGC in the future," he said.

Sharpe said she did not think that AWS would have any problem because she is certain of success. "I feel the festival will be a remarkable success. I've been working all summer with the festival and I know it is going to come through."

The festival is not a program for women students only, Sharpe said, but a program that will involve the entire University.

"We plan to highlight the festival with resources from the University community along with interesting speakers from the national scope," Sharpe said, adding that Bella Abzug, former U.S. Congressman from New York, has been contacted about the possibility of speaking at the festival.

Betty Ausherman, AWS chairperson, said the issues addressed by the International Women's Year in 1975 molded the theme of the planned festival.

usual, not flushing the johns as much and doubling the laundry loads some. But not as much as last year."

"Conservation efforts aren't quite the same from housing this year," says junior Jeb Blackwell of 516 Ehringhaus. "People aren't quite as concerned as they were last year, either. But this past week I've noticed conservation improving, such as toilets not being flushed as often."

"The water fountains have been unplugged, and nobody has any plans to water on this hall," says sophomore Jeff Cox of 122 Connor. "The water situation seems twice as bad as last year, but everyone is taking long showers anyway."

Senior Julie Rice of 211 Joyner says she believes there is a crisis, but admits she has been guilty of taking long showers. "The only real efforts at conservation that I've seen have been less flushing of toilets," she says.
