

Soccer faces mighty ASU

By TOD HUGHES
Staff Writer

The UNC soccer team is in Boone today for a night game against Appalachian State. The Heels have ample reason to get psyched for today's match: the Mountaineers are an extremely talented team, currently ranked 16th in the nation. ASU has recruited many Nigerian players who bring experience and skilled play to the Apps' lineup.

UNC coach Anson Dorrance said ASU's recruiting techniques are similar to Clemson's, another heavily foreign-recruited team. In both cases, the foreign players have helped turn their respective teams into soccer powers. ASU lost to Clemson 2-0 this year, a very respectable score against last season's fourth best team in the country.

"They're very good," Dorrance said of the Apps. "It would be a phenomenal upset for us to win."

Recently ASU played High Point, which lost to UNC 6-1, and won 3-2. But according to High Point coach Ken Chartier, ASU's technique was so good that it only misplayed about four balls all day. The Apps dominated the game so completely that they started relaxing, which enabled High Point to stay in the game.

Dorrance expects ASU to come out attacking, and his strategy is to counter by putting the team into its 1-3-1-3-2 defensive alignment in which the Heels played well against Rollins.

Girls involved for fun and friends

Women's IM participation balloons

intramurals

By RICK SCOPPE

It used to be that girls were never thought of as much more than pretty, dainty figures. Participation in anything sporting or recreational was taboo.

But things have changed. Today women are participating in, as well as viewing with interest, all kinds of sports. And although men still outnumber women in intramural participation at UNC, women are becoming involved in IMs in increasing numbers.

"It's more of a social aspect for our dorm," said Cindy Kress, Parker's intramural manager. "There are a lot of athletic women in Parker and we have somewhat of a tradition in intramurals, but it's still mostly just for the fun and participation of it that we play intramurals."

"Here at Aycock the competition is not as stiff as over at Parker. It's just something to do," said Linda Grizzle, Aycock's intramural manager.

Intramurals is a way of beginning friendships," said Cathy Campbell, Granville South's intramural manager. "You get to know more and more girls on your hall and have something to talk with them about."

"We use it as a study break," said Marsha Jenkins, Joyner's intramural manager. "We found them to sign-up. I think they'll go crazy if they stay in the dorm too much."

Kress said that Parker has 180 women and about 125 participate in one sport or another. Both Granville and Aycock managers said they usually get around 25 percent of their women out to play one sport of another, while in Joyner around 50 percent of the women are involved in some intramural sport.

The most popular sports are team sports, such as volleyball and basketball, while the managers have said they have trouble recruiting girls for track, an individual sport.

"I think it's that some of the girls are scared to compete in individual sports," said Laura Boyce, Aycock's other intramural manager.

"Also, track is a sport that has many varied events and it's single elimination," she said.

"We're having trouble getting up women to participate in track," Jenkins said. "No one seems that interested in it. We have much more favorable response when Co-Rec sports are coming near."

"The women go crazy. We team up with Everett and we can always count on two or three Co-Rec teams in some sports."

Still, intramurals are usually played more for the fun and activity involved, and not so much for the need to win.

"It's usually social up until the playoffs," said Sandy Hill, Parker's other intramural manager. "Then it's for honors (of saying we won)."

"Once we get the girls to come out and play they usually surprise themselves," Jenkins said.

With more and more women playing intramurals, what effect does it have on the referees?

"The referees tend to not take the women's games as seriously as the men's," Hill said.

"I can remember one game we played when there were no penalties called at all," Grizzle said.

On the whole, though, most of the managers seemed to say that referees did a good job of officiating their games, even if they didn't take the women's screaming at a supposed bad call seriously.

"You'd be surprised at how well our girls take losses," Jenkins said. "I'm usually the one most upset at the referees' calls."

Track sign-ups end Wednesday while both volleyball and inner tube polo entries will be taken until Friday.

Starting this week there will be volleyball games at noon every Tuesday and Thursday in Woolen Gym. Everyone is invited.

New season starting for Carolina football

By GENE UPCHURCH

Carolina's football game against Wake Forest here Saturday is the start of something new for the Tar Heels.

"It's like the start of a new season for us," UNC coach Bill Dooley said Tuesday at his weekly press conference.

Dooley probably would like to start the season again. His team has dropped two 10-7 games to top 20-ranked teams in the four games played this season and opens the Atlantic Coast Conference season against a potentially explosive Wake team.

"They're like a dynamite keg waiting to explode," he said. "They have the right people."

One of the "right" people for Wake is sophomore tailback James McDougald, who played only half the game in the Deacons' 26-17 loss to Purdue last weekend because of some minor injuries. McDougald has picked up 415 yards already this season.

"If we hope to stop Wake, we must at least slow down McDougald," Dooley said.

Quarterback Mike McGlamry is another Deacon threat, Dooley said. McGlamry has completed 51 percent of his passes so far this season, most of them to tight end Steve Young, who leads the team in pass receptions with 265 yards and two touchdowns.

"They have good personnel," Dooley said.

"They have the nucleus of the team back from last year." The Deacons finished with a 5-6 record last season.

Injuries played a significant role in Carolina's loss to Texas Tech last weekend. Quarterback Matt Kupec saw no action against the Red Raiders and Dooley admitted that might have hurt the Tar Heels.

"Matt has had his feet to the fire before," he said. "It might have helped to have him in the game, but that's no excuse."

Kupec is practicing this week, but is not 100 percent, Dooley said. A decision will be made later this week about whether he will play against Wake. He injured his knee and ankle against Northwestern but dressed for the Texas Tech game.

"His leg wasn't stable," Dooley said. "He needed to be able to run and cut with the leg. He could get in more trouble if he were in the game and couldn't do that. He looks good right now, but he's not full speed yet."

Clyde Christensen started the game at quarterback instead of P. J. Gay because he was more experienced, Dooley said.

"He'd been through two full spring practices while P. J. had to miss spring practice (for baseball)," Dooley said. "We wanted someone with a little more experience particularly against Texas Tech's multiple defense."

Billy Johnson, who opened the season at the starting tailback spot, was played only sparingly against Tech because of an injured knee. Dooley said Johnson's knee is recovering but no decision has been made yet on whether Johnson will start against Wake.

ECU gets baseball win

East Carolina scored six runs in the second inning and went on to end UNC's six-game winning streak with a 7-3 victory in a fall baseball game Monday night in Greenville.

Roy Clark's two-run homer led the Tar Heels' hitting.

UNC faces Methodist College in a 6:30 doubleheader Wednesday night in Boshamer Stadium.
