

Especially on drop period

Phillips wants no student apathy

By DINITA JAMES
Staff Writer

Student Body President Jim Phillips says the main emphasis of his plans for the coming year is student involvement in the decisions which affect their lives at the University.

"Student Government has to change from being an organization that exists as an end in itself," Phillips said. "It has to be a means to an end for the students. We need to make students aware of the things that matter to them."

One item which should be top priority for students, Phillips said, is the issue of the drop period. He said he wants to see the drop period extended from four to six weeks this academic year. "If it doesn't get done this year," Phillips said, "it won't get done. The class of '78 is the only class which has known a longer drop period."

When upperclassmen picked up their schedules, they were asked to fill out a survey in cluding several questions about the drop period. From the six to seven thousand persons who filed the survey, Phillips said he hopes to get a solid base of student opinion from which to work.

Before the issue is brought to the Faculty Council, Phillips said he plans to have his staff go door to door and inform students about the benefits of a longer drop period.

"We want to mobilize the students," Phillips said. "We want two or three thousand lining the walls of Hamilton Hall when the drop extension is introduced. The only way we can get it changed is if the students show they care."

Phillips said another goal is to get a student member on the Educational Policy Committee. This question also must be brought before the Faculty Council.

"Students now have no voice on the educational policy that affects us every day," Phillips said. "We pay for it, and still we have no say in it. What we have to say should count."

The Education Policy Committee studies education issues the Faculty Council will consider and makers recommendations. The Faculty Council then votes on all educational policy.

Another issue Phillips hopes to see settled in the near future is minority representation on the Campus Governing Council.

Currently, all representatives on the CGC are white students. In such a situation, the student body president has the power to appoint two minority representatives. Phillips said he definitely will exercise that power.

"Unless we have minority opinion, there is a void on the council," he said. "It can't be fully informed or fully representative. The fact that there will be minority students on the council will make for better input and better relations between the white community and minority communities on campus."

Phillips also plans to work closely with the University administration on the housing shortage. He said he feels the University is ready to take action, possibly by selling land to contractors to build apartments specifically for students. Although all plans are tentative, Phillips said he believes action to relieve the shortage will begin soon.

The parking problems on campus is another area of concern in Phillips' administration. Craig Brown is currently studying the priority system for the allocation of parking stickers. He said he feels some changes in the priorities need to be made, including giving preferences to commuters rather than to students living on campus.

Last spring, Student Government opposed the proposed addition to the Health Affairs parking deck. This summer the group dropped its opposition.

"The University compromised," Phillips said, "and we thought we got a good deal." The deal includes a $2,500 park-ride study and the building of fringe lots with bus service on Manning Drive.

Phillips also plans to conduct studies on the various student services on campus. The Student Health Service is one of the areas being studied by his staff.

One of the questions about the Student Health Service which will be included in the study is the $6 per semester fee each student pays for the construction of the new infirmary facility. Some students who are paying for this service will have graduated before the facility is in use. A rebate to students who already have paid for the facility and will never use it also is being studied.

The food service and the Student Stores also will be studied as to their quality and efficiency. Phillips said he wants to find out why students pay full publisher's suggested retail price for books when a profit could be made for the Student Stores scholarship fund even if the store sold books at a discount price.

Because of the number of students who have mentioned the intramural program as an area that needs improvement, Phillips says he also plans to look into ways to revamp and rekindle the program.

Phillips said he plans for Student Government to help establish several organizations, including an academic action group, aluminum recycling, and to help rejuvenate the North Carolina Association of Student Governments.

Counselor: UNC doesn't aid transfers suffering freshman-like disorientation

By MARTHA WAGGONER
Staff Writer

During the first months of school, the only people adjusting to college life are the freshmen, right?

Not necessarily. While the approximately 800 junior transfer students who come to UNC each year already have two years of college behind them, they still must adjust to a new campus, new people and a new way of doing almost everything.

Carolina is not geared to help them make the adjustment, says John Reinhold, a clinical social worker and director of University Counseling Service.

At a meeting of transfer student counselors Saturday, Reinhold said he was "struck by the lack of support and services for transfers. It's just sort of assumed they'll make it."

Reinhold said transfers must go through a natural coping process they already have experienced once as freshmen. However, transfers also may experience forms of depression uniquely associated with transfer status.

Depression could stem from a number of adjustment problems, Reinhold said. These include loss of friends from the transfer's previous school, second thoughts about attending Carolina, the isolating experience of living in an apartment and the University's special emphasis on orienting freshmen rather than transfers.

Transfer students feel they should be able to cope with everything because of their prior college experience, Reinhold said. He told counselors to let transfers know that their feelings of inadequacy are natural and to encourage them to ask questions.

Reinhold suggested transfers not try to make any other drastic changes, such as in diet or religion, while they are adjusting to their new environment.

He also suggested if transfers do encounter any problems adapting, they should take advantage of counseling resources on campus including their adviser, the University Counseling Service and the Reading and Learning Skills program.

Barbara Polk, assistant chairperson of the Orientation Commission, said transfer students also must face the same problems everyone else must deal with, such as parking and housing, as well as becoming oriented to UNC.

Transfer students, for example, could not apply for parking stickers until they arrived on campus, meaning they probably have no place to park on campus. This in turn, is a problem because few transfer students can live on campus. And their applications to the University usually are accepted so late in the year that even finding an apartment is difficult.

Fraternities are housing some transfers, but sororities haven't been able to help out because of rush, said Walton Reeves, co-director of transfer student programs.

Also, the Orientation Commission sent a survey to professors to search out places for students to stay, but as of last week, less than a dozen professors had offered to let students stay with them.

Last year, it took some transfer students up to four weeks to settle in permanent housing after their arrival on campus, Reeves said.
