Town faces revenue gap

If Chapel Hill expenditures remain constant or increase according to current trends, a large revenue gap will occur, said Chapel Hill Town Manager David Taylor, who presented an interim budget report to the Town Council Monday night.

Taylor told the council that it would take about $907,000 in increased revenue to maintain current service levels next

To close the gap, the council has a choice of increasing taxes by about 13¢-per-$100 valuation or combining a tax increase, a service level decrease and other revenue increases, Taylor said.

Despite the revenue gap, Taylor said that his estimates showed an overall decrease in spending growth when compared to previous years.

Members of the town staff have projected that spending for the current year will be about $9,071,926. And Taylor's preliminary estimate for the coming year is $9,829,835, if there are no reductions in town service levels. The projected revenue for the coming year is only $8,923,056.

Council member Joe Straley said that he regretted that the town was now put in the position of having to replace funds that were lost while trying to balance revenues and expenditures in the current year's budget.

"I think that last year was a year we ended up making a great mistake," Straley said, "In actual fact we did not live within our means."

Council member Winston Broadfoot, who has been in favor of a tight budget, strongly rejected the idea of a tax in-

"The one thing that I am really not interested in doing is raising the taxes," he said. "It's really not negotiable as far as I am concerned."

In budget sessions held earlier this month, Broadfoot said he wanted the council to take a "hardball" stance on the

"We're going to face a $1,600,000 shortfall if we keep spending as we have been spending," he said.

Broadfoot said Monday night that about $600,000 of the revenue gap could be made up through user fees like those paid to use recreational facilities and for inspections conducted by the town.

Taylor, however, said that user fees could not significantly affect the revenue gap.

In his preliminary report, Taylor examined several areas in which cuts could be made, ranging from those that could reduce service levels to those that would not significantly af-

After combining cuts he proposed in those areas, Taylor gave a figure of $541,900 as possible reductions in spending. Taylor presented a recommendation earlier this month on rescaling the town's human services department.

"The proposal shows a substantial reduction in the number of dollars allocated to the human services needs of the community," Taylor said. "But it will be a much trimmer and neater operation."

Carrboro Board of Aldermen approves housing constructions

By MARY WILLOUGHBY Staff Writer

TO THE REPORT OF THE PARTY OF T

The Carrboro Board of Aldermen approved a proposal Tuesday night for the construction of 30 units of public housing on a six-acre tract of land off North Greensboro Street.

The proposal passed in a 4-2 vote, despite the opposition from aldermen Joyce Garrett and John Boone, who argued that the public housing would cause an increase in crime and create traffic congestion and drainage problems. The high concentration of low-income families in one area of the community also was cited as a problem.

According to a Chapel Hill Public Safety officer, crime rates are higher in low income areas. Marvin Clark told the board he had first-hand experience dealing with crime in Chapel Hill's public housing projects. He cited breaking-andenterings, riots and domestic disputes as typical problems.

"AMERICA IN PIECES"

Alderman Hilliard Caldwell challenged Clark, saying that at the last public hearing Chapel Hill Police Chief Herman Stone said crime in public housing projects was not greater than it was in other areas of the community.

Garrett vehemently opposed the project plans, arguing throughout the evening that potential traffic problems and the Chapel Hill Housing Authority's role in the project concerned her.

In mid-March the town planning staff approved the project noting that the plans met various town standards. Additionally, three standing committees made up of Carrboro residents-the Planning Committee, Appearance Committee and Transportation Committee-also approved the project plans.

In other board action, a unanimous vote gave approval to a proposal allowing the construction of 273 townhouses on 47 acres of land off Smith Level Road. Also, the board created a cemetery committee.

Get on to Raleigh. Why is it that every year the CGA has it's "Hey I'm gay lets wear blue jeans day." Does it really matter; I don't care if somebody is gay. If that person wishes to be gay and is happy fine, but why should everyone else be subjected to it? It seems this isn't for their personal satisfaction but for publicity. Guys, kiss your boyfriends then we'll know you're gay. Should all people who play sports wear tennis shoes every Tuesday? What if all dean's list students were to wear white shirts every Wednesday? My point is why try to inconvenience other students by having a

"Blue Jean" day. Why don't all gays just wear a sign that says "I'm gay" then everyone will know. I think the CGA is using blue jeans as cheap publicity. I'm going to wear my blue jeans Friday and so are a lot of other people that aren't gay. So who will know who's gay? If someone wishes to be gay, fine, but don't try to gain publicity through non-gays.
