

Rain dampens fun Concert bands engage crowd

Although it was wet, the Carolina Concert for Children wasn't a wash out.

About 3,000 people turned out Saturday to hear Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five, The Producers, U2 and Todd Rundgren.

The concert opened with Grandmaster Flash, a funk group from New York City made popular by a type of music called "rap."

The band improvised its own vocals to pre-recorded music in response to the audience. Dressed in costumes ranging from a white leather cowboy outfit to a police uniform, the seven members danced and interacted with the crowd as they sang to dance music.

The next band, The Producers, a relatively new band from Atlanta, has developed a sound called "progressive pop."

Made popular by the hit "What's He Got" and more recently, "She Sheila," the band combines the effects of studio production with the spontaneity of live performance.

U2's lead singer, Bono from Dublin, Ireland, thanked everyone for coming to the opening of the band's third American tour. "We'd like to thank you for making it rain today so it would be more like home for us," he said.

After climbing to a scaffold on top of a pole, Bono surveyed the crowd as he sang "Sunday, Bloody Sunday," a song which protests war and public apathy.

When he came down from his perch, Bono explained his climb. "Sometimes you have to do things like that to prove that even though we're 15 yards apart, you've still gotta' break through."

Throughout the set, he continued to leap on and off the stage, keeping stagehands busy rearranging the long cord which connected him with the speakers and the audience.

And the crowd responded.

Forgetting about the rain, people moved as one to the front to dance and get closer to the singer as he pushed up against the fence between him and his fans.

Alternating between a Steinway grand piano and guitars, Todd Rundgren entertained true fans, who braved the downpour, with his parodies and witticisms and a rapport which was enhanced by the smaller, more intimate, enthusiastic crowd.

He, too, decided to get wet by getting closer to people who again left their seats and umbrellas to participate in the music.

All of the bands played encores. Again and again they complimented people for braving the elements.

Although the show lost $30,000 to $40,000, the people who went seemed to enjoy the concert.

The event went without many of the problems — such as injuries and technical trouble — which had affected previous concerts.

Happy late birthday Helen!!!

ment of the University to undergraduate teaching:

- The first floor of Lenoir Hall be renovated as a cafeteria where students and faculty can talk in an informal atmosphere;
- Ticket distribution be altered so it does not interfere with classes;

- Faculty be encouraged to devote more time to undergraduate teaching through leave programs. Senior faculty members should periodically teach introductory courses;
- The honors program be expanded to involve juniors and a review process for honors courses be instituted;

- A computer literacy program be developed and made available to students;
- A committee be set up to periodically examine the advising program, usually the first contact a student has with the University.

Responding to a question at Friday's meeting from University Librarian James F. Govan, Graves said the committee had looked into the intellectual atmosphere of the libraries but had no suggestions there. "Students seem to be able to study with all the noise," Graves said. "Maybe it's a generational thing."
