Single parenthood and an increasing number of abortions are slowing the adoption process for parents who want

Jean Johnson, director of professional services for the Children's Home Society of North Carolina, helps prospective parents adopt children through her Greensboro office, but she says abortions and single parenthood are making her job more difficult.

"In this day and time, there are so many more couples that want to adopt than there are babies," she says. "We simply cannot help everybody that wants to adopt a child.

"There's a trend that's apparent now in the changing mores," Johnson says. "More people are keeping their babies as single parents. There's less stigma in doing that than there used to be. That's really the big trend."

Sandy Martin, supervisor for the Raleigh office of Children's Home, has also seen the trend. Many more prospective parents applied to her office than the number of available children.

"There are a lot of couples that are not fertile," she says, but there are other reasons for the slow adoption process. A Raleigh caseworker, Debbie Christos, says the abortion laws passed in 1972 mean fewer pregnancies are brought to term, so fewer children are put up for adoption. But, like Johnson and Martin, Christos points to the increasing number of single-parent mothers.

Johnson began working for Children's Home in 1957, when the situation was different. "In those days, this (pregnancy out of wedlock) was just a terrible problem that they (mothers) didn't want anyone to know about," she says. "They wanted to handle everything in the strictest confidence.... We had more cases than we could handle." The agency's Child Care Center had 22 cribs then, and 200 to 300 children were placed each year. Now there are six cribs at the center, all unoccupied, and 193 babies were placed last

More than 2,100 couples asked to adopt children, however, which meant a lot of parents left Children's Home disappointed.

"There's no way in the world we could work with 2,100 people," Johnson says. "They have to be turned down and they don't like that. It hurts their feelings, and I can understand that, because all they want to do is be a parent and have a family.

"I don't know what it feels like not to be able to produce a child for your husband when you want one more than anything in the world. That must be devastating.

"And then when you wait. We're talking about perfectly adequate people who've never had to ask for anything before. It's hard to be on the other side of the desk and beg for a child."

Despite those problems, Johnson says she feels the Children's Home will continue to thrive. "We have never closed our doors, and I don't think we're going to. There are still many children that need us, and as long as that is true, we're still going to be in business."

The Children's Home Society was begun in 1902, when a group of men realized there was a need for an adoption agency in Greensboro. Accurate records weren't kept until the 1940s, so no one knows how many children have found homes during the last 81 years. But, Johnson says, "We know it's more than Now nine district offices comprise Children's Home. They are located in Charlotte, Asheville, Fayetteville, Raleigh, Greenville, Wilmington, Greensboro, Winston-Salem and Jacksonville. The home is funded by private contributions and grants by Reynolds Health Care Trust and Duke Endowment, among others. The United Way provides 20 to 23 percent of the agency's $1 million budget.

Adoptive parents can also contribute to the agency. "People who benefit from our services believe in it, and they are willing to help support us," Johnson says.

They can choose from two separate programs. The baby program involves care for infants at the Child Care Clinic, where three nurses work full time. The other program, the Inter-Agency Placement Program, involves finding homes for older children who are in the custody of agencies such as the state Department of Social Services.

"If they don't have a suitable home for a 9-, 10- or 12-yearold, if we have a home, we'll be glad to share it with them," Johnson says. "Our babies get the very best of care early in life. They're not just put in a foster home and left."

Placements take from one to two years, and Children's Home placed 148 infants and 45 children in 1982. That's the best part of adoption — when a child finds a happy home.

"It's our privilege to see the greatest joy that you can imagine," Johnson says. "They (parents) are just simply ecstatic. They don't even act normal.

"Some of them are just in a daze, in a state of shock. The joy that you see - I think this is one of the real satisfactions you get working for an adoption agency. "You can see the results."

It took almost two years for a Raleigh woman to adopt a child from Children's Home, but to her the wait was worth it. The woman, who asked not to be identified, finally received a "happy letter" from the agency in January 1978, saying that she might adopt a child named Shannon.

"It was worded so it sounds like you will get a child, but you don't know when or where," she says. "But you're never prepared for the day when they call you to tell you (that) you can adopt. It's just so exciting."

After serving as the EPA head from 1970 to 1973, Ruckelshaus was the acting director of the FBI for about 90 days in 1973 and was involved in the Watergate hearings.

that the events leading to the shooting had been building up for many years. His son had some type of "irritation" from birth and none of the doctors could pinpoint it, he said.

Craig Newman had returned to Chapel Hill on Aug. 7 after five years of moving to different parts of the country. William Newman said his son had become increasingly ill and unstable. He had physically assaulted both of his parents prior to the shooting, Newman said.

Police had intervened in the problems on Oct. 11, when Craig Newman became violent after an incident in a Chapel Hill bank. Chapel Hill and Campus Police were summoned to the alley outside of the Porthole Restaurant. After an incident on the morning of Oct. 12 when Craig knocked his mother to the floor, the Newmans decided it was time for him to leave their home.

"Our son comes out looking like an ogre, but he was actually a nice kid on the other side of the schizophrenia," Newman said.

"He was always apologizing for the trouble he caused, said he wanted to repay us, which was pathetically sad," Newman said.

Craig Newman had psychoanalysis when he was young, and he saw his life as a series of defeats, his father said. Claire Newman, his mother, said they constantly tried to get their son to seek help, but he had convinced himself that he did not need it. The younger Newman had no criminal record or known use of drugs, she said.

"One tends to give the most love to the most handicapped child," William Newman said. "Our loss is overwhelming." The whole incident is a failure on our part to solve the problem, Newman

William Newman retired from the University in 1977. He is an internationally known musicologist and is active in publishing and research. He is currently doing reasearch at the National Humanities Center in Research Triangle Park. Newman, a faculty member for 38 years, became a distinguished professor of music in 1962.
