

Forensics team takes 11th in Nationals

Sam Hill, a senior from Trinity, won the National Individual Events Tournament's information speaking contest in speech communications April 13-16.

Hill, president of the Carolina Forensics Union, spoke on the theory of relativity.

Joanne Gilbert, Jeff Knight, Jim Fitzgerald, Lisa Smith, Sibby Anderson and Vikki Barrett accompanied Hill to the NIET in Manhattan, Kansas. The tournament has competition in 10 categories. "We had people in nine of those 10 events," Hill said.

"We advanced five of those nine events into the quarterfinal rounds," Hill said. In addition to Hill's competition in the category of informative speaking, he made it to the quarterfinals in communications analysis — a competition in which the speaker must focus on and critique a rhetorical event.

Gilbert, captain of the individual events team, made it to the quarterfinals in persuasive speaking, poetry interpretation and after dinner speaking — a humorous speech on a serious topic, Hill said. Gilbert also advanced to the semifinals in persuasive speaking.

The University came in 11th in a field of 102 schools with 400 students, Hill said. Students who participated in the tournament were among the top three persons in each of the 10 categories from their districts, he said. UNC is in the southeast district.

"The NIET is not an invitational tournament; it is highly selective," Hill said. "It's the culmination of events." Hill said he has participated in eight or nine tournaments this year before the Nationals.

"Some schools offer fellowships and scholarships for people who compete in these tournaments. People here do it because they want to represent Carolina and they're proud of it," Hill said.

The Carolina Forensics Union consists of an individual event team and debate team, Hill said. The debate team attended a national tournament in April and is also nationally recognized.

"Carolina is a rare school in that we have nationally competitive debate and individual event teams," Hill said.

Alcohol linked to emphysema prevention

A recent study has shown that smokers who also drink are not as likely to develop emphysema, compared to smokers who do not drink alcohol. The study, conducted by Duke University researchers, could prove to be very important in finding a prevention, or even a cure, for the disease.

Emphysema is caused by the progressive destruction of the alveoli, or the small air sacs, in the lungs. The destruction of the sacs prevents the body from receiving as much oxygen as it needs. As of now there is no cure for the disease. The role alcohol plays is not understood. Dr. Philip Pratt, one of the Duke researchers, says that alcohol seems to restore a proper balance by inhibiting the actions of the inflammatory cells in the lungs, which reduces the release of the harmful enzymes. In studying over 600 lungs collected through autopsies, the researchers found that the appearance of emphysema in smokers diminished progressively as alcohol use increased. Twenty-six percent of the nondrinkers had significant progression of the disease, whereas only 10 percent of the smokers, who also drank, were found to have the disease.

Pratt said, however, that the results of the study are not meant to advocate drinking alcohol. He said that the little amount of protection that the alcohol gives smokers is minimal compared to the damage that it may cause other parts of the body.

Books needed for prison libraries

During the book buy-back period students are asked to donate any books to the library department of the North Carolina Prison System. The drive is sponsored by Perry Fisher, a UNC student. "Any book will be great," Fisher said. "Even if they are five years old, the books are fine. The prisoners do not have to worry about it being for a class next semester." Donation boxes will be near the posts outside the UNC bookstore.

Media Board names Rickert 'Phoenix' editor

Arne Rickert was appointed editor of The Phoenix at a meeting of the Media Board Tuesday night. Rickert, a junior radio, television and motion pictures major, was the only candidate for the position. The board also appointed Margaret Campbell business manager for The Phoenix. Greg Smith, currently Phoenix editor, announced that there would be an issue Monday. The Phoenix will be dropped at regular drop sites, although it will not be a regular class day, Smith said.

The board also decided to accept the Josten Publishing Co.'s bid for the 1984-85 Yackety Yack. The Yack had been published by Hunter Publishing in Winston-Salem for the past several years.
