Campbell, associate director of the Carolina Fund, $10,000 went to set up a scholarship endowment, and the remaining $5,000 set up an operating endowment to help start the CSF, a student organization created to help students find ways to raise money for their campus organizations.

The $15,000 came from proceeds of the sale of student tickets allocated for the Thanksgiving football game against Bowling Green. Because most students went home before the game, the athletic department sold the student tickets.

In addition, in 1982-83, the Rams Club gave $4,000 to the debate team so the University could send an individual events team to the national championship debate tournament in Ogden, Utah. William Balthrop, faculty advisor of the debate team, said the Rams Club was very receptive to the debate team's request for money.

"I don't think they want the whole world to come over there asking for money, but they did show they're willing to help out," Balthrop said. "And given the inherent nature of this group toward athletics, I think they're more in tune with academics than any other athletic organization I know of."

According to Moyer Smith, associate athletic director, the rest of the Rams Club money was used for athletic purposes.

Another $1 million paid for Rams Club tickets to athletic events, and about $500,000 went toward office expenses and Educational Foundation salaries. The foundation invests any additional money or uses it to rectify deficits in the athletic department's operations budget, Smith said.

Athletic Director John Swofford said the Rams Club's money plays an indirect role in the athletic department. Because the foundation funds as many full and partial scholarships as the NCAA allows, the University is able to afford an extensive non-revenue sports program and to devote more funds to facility improvements, Swofford said.

"If we had to take from our operating budget to pay for the scholarships, we'd end up eliminating sports," Swofford said.
