Doctorate in religious studies to be offered in fall

By GEORGIA MARTIN
Staff Writer

The Board of Governors approved the establishment of a doctoral degree program in religious studies at UNC Friday. The program will begin in the fall of this year. The main objective of the doctoral program will be to prepare students for careers in college and university teaching and will be closely related to teaching programs in other University departments.

John Van Seters, chairman of the department of religious studies, called the program long overdue. "It's important that the department of religious studies has a doctoral program in the same way it's important for other departments to have doctoral programs," Van Seters said. "UNC is a research university."

Van Seters said there would not be many students directly enrolled in the doctoral program the first year — two or three at the most, but the department said it estimates a total of 20 students will be enrolled by the program's fourth year.

The new program will include five fields of study: religion and culture, history and phenomenology of religions, ancient mediterranean religions, medieval and early modern studies and American religious studies.

Students normally will enter the doctoral program after completing a master's degree program such as the M.A. in religious studies at UNC.

In other business, the BOG voted to classify a membership in the General Assembly as a part-time rather than full-time job, making it easier for faculty members and administrators to serve in the legislature.

Lack of funds may end E-Z Rider, Shared Ride services

By DEVI SEN
Staff Writer

Operation of E-Z Rider and Shared Ride bus systems may be threatened this spring unless the Carrboro Board of Aldermen allocates more money to the bus services' dwindling funds, the Carrboro town transportation planner said last week.

David Bonk, town transportation planner, told the board Wednesday night that because bus service hours had been increased, projections indicated funds for the E-Z Rider and Shared Ride bus services would run out by the beginning of May. According to the projections, the $25,400 allocated for operating the services this fiscal year will fall $5,700 short of the amount needed, Bonk said.

"The report I made was based on (use of the services) the first six months of last year (1984-85). Based on January of last year, I projected a figure for this year.

We were approximately $6,700 short," Bonk said. "Then we received the actual costs for this January, and I shortened my estimate by about $1,000."

The E-Z Rider bus system serves handicapped and elderly people who are unable to use regular bus services. The Shared Ride system transports people who do not live near the regular bus routes.

The Chapel Hill Transit System, which operates both Carrboro ride services, charges Carrboro for each hour of use of the services. Carrboro is charged $23.50 per hour for E-Z Rider service and $14.50 per hour for Shared Ride service, Bonk said.

"Services have increased recently because these programs are relatively new," Bonk said. "The more people who learn about it, the more service it gets."

The operating cost of E-Z Rider has increased by 39 percent since last year, while Shared Ride has gone up by 9 percent, Bonk said. E-Z Rider makes up the bulk of expenses and would be cut first, but only slightly, Bonk said.

He said he believed the services were popular because of the retirement community in the Chapel Hill-Carrboro area and because UNC had been recruiting more handicapped students who were eligible for the service.

Bob Godding, Chapel Hill transportation director, said the program needed more funds from Carrboro. "The board appropriates (a certain amount) of money each year, and the money has run out," he said. "We have to ask Carrboro for more."

Carrboro's contingency fund of about $20,000 is capable of financing the additional money needed, Bonk said. The contingency fund gives the council the ability to be flexible by allowing it to make additions to existing programs, according to Bonk.

"I can't read the mind of the council, but there is enough money to run the services," he said.

Feedback indicates approval of student advising service

By WAYNE GRIMSLEY

What was at first hesitation about the usefulness of the Student Advising Service has been replaced by full support, according to the service's director.

Jane Gordon, a junior from Morehead City who directs the service, said a survey receiving 243 responses indicated the advising service was beneficial. "Ninety percent said it was useful... excellent," Gordon said. The administration was first hesitant about the service but is now supportive of it, she said.

The service was set up last fall by a Student Government committee headed by Gordon. The committee was formed by Student Body President Paul Parker to study the needs of students in the area of academic counseling.

Gordon said she hoped it would become campus-wide and funds would be expanded for it in the fall. Advisers are not paid for their services.

Five campus residences now provide advisers for students: Cobb, Connor, Granville Towers, Graham and Morrison. "The advisers are trained to know about curriculum requirements and other counseling services and personal advice," Gordon said. She said students would be paired with advisers who have similar majors.

"At night, (students) may have a little question on their major," Hillery Rink, a junior who lives in Connor dormitory, said. "It's a convenience for them."

"We give the information when they can't get (to) their counselors," said adviser Randy Lineberger, a junior who also lives in Connor.

Gordon said the service was not meant to replace counselors but was to be used only as an immediate information source.

"It's really informal," Lineberger said. "(A student) will walk down the hall and ask 'Can you help me?'"

Lineberger said he helped several people fill out preregistration forms last semester. "Even upperclassmen sought help," he added.

The newly individuated 'Tar Heel' writing test

Students who come by the 'Daily Tar Heel' office from 2-3 or 7-8 p.m. today through Friday will be assigned a story due in two days (not including Saturday.) Prospective writers are encouraged to come up with their own story ideas, but be sure to talk to Arne, Dave or Stuart about your plans before you begin. We're looking for people with flair, energy and creativity, not simply those with a knowledge of journalistic style. Good luck!

PIRG lobbying jobs available

Representatives from the Public Interest Research Group will interview on campus Feb. 19. Jobs are available for graduating seniors in lobbying state legislatures on issues such as hazardous waste and consumer needs. Students who wish to interview with the group must register at the University Career Planning and Placement Services office in Hanes Hall by Feb. 18.
