

declining minority enrollment in the face of rising college costs and reductions of federal student aid. Hackley said he doubted the traditionally white institutions would ever meet the goal. "We'll have to look at enrollment figures throughout the nation and decide whether it is reasonable," Hackley said. "I don't think we can do much more than they're doing." Hackley said heavy recruitment was a reason for the UNC system defying the national trend. "The quicker we can get a child interested in college, the better," Hackley said. "Most states do not recruit until the 12th grade, then it's too late. We start at the seventh grade." Another reason is the location of UNC system schools, he said. "Geographic access is fairly uniform across North Carolina," he said. Among the traditionally white schools, significant increases in black enrollment came at East Carolina, which rose by 112 black students to 11.4 percent, and N.C. State, which rose by 199 black students to 8.8 percent. The biggest increases in black students came at the traditionally black institutions, particularly at N.C. A&T and N.C. Central. Several traditionally white institutions saw declines in black students this fall, including the N.C. School of the Arts, UNC—Asheville, UNC—Greensboro and Western Carolina. In other matters discussed on Friday, BOG Chairman Philip Carson said the board's presidential search committee was doing "nothing dramatic" and was "under no pressure" in its search for a successor to UNC President William C. Friday, who will retire this July.
