Train crash lives in man's mind

From Associated Press reports
CLAREMONT — J. E. "Jake" Smyre won't ever forget the morning of Sept. 19, 1949.

The 87-year-old Claremont resident still has vivid memories of that morning when Southern Railway passenger train No. 15 left Salisbury and came speeding through Newton, resulting in one of the worst train wrecks in Catawba County's history.

Smyre, who worked with the railway mail and is the only member of the train crew still living, said the train left Salisbury around 3 a.m. Approximately 5:20 a.m., the train came within three blocks of the depot in Newton but failed to make the horseshoe curve at Rowe's Crossing.

The train carried nearly 40 passengers plus several crew members. Thirty-four passengers were injured, some critically, and three crew members were killed.

"It's miraculous that half the people didn't get killed," Smyre said.

Smyre said the crew left Salisbury after eating breakfast together. He had thrown off mail in several locations, including Catawba and Claremont. Smyre said the train made the run from Catawba to Claremont in four minutes flat, whereas it usually took the train slightly more than five minutes to travel that distance.

At that time crew members suspected trouble.

Smyre said that when the wreckage was probed, the throttle was found to have been frozen at 94 miles per hour.

The two engines jumped the track and took with them the Railway Post Office car, two storage mail cars, one Railway Express car, one baggage-passenger car and the dining car. Six pullman and coach cars remained upright on the track and rolled to a stop near the depot.

Smyre said the impact of one car against another did most of the damage and caused most of the injuries.

Arrest reminded actress of Gestapo

From Associated Press reports
BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Actress Zsa Zsa Gabor testified tearfully Wednesday that she screamed for her life when she was arrested by a motorcycle policeman, saying it reminded her of the German Gestapo of her youth.

"I was screaming, 'Help, help, help!'" Gabor said during her second day of testimony in the trial in which she is accused of slapping the officer. "I was afraid of the police. They were going to shoot me."

Gabor, a Hungarian beauty queen before World War II who is believed to be in her late 60s, wore the same outfit — including a brightly flowered, knee-length skirt with petticoats — to court that she wore June 14, the day she was arrested.

In a trial costing taxpayers $2,000 a day in court expenses, Gabor testified that during her arrest she was handcuffed and "plunked down" on the curb next to her Rolls Royce convertible. "They don't give a damn about me. I was sitting on the floor half nude," she testified.

Gabor is charged with battery on a police officer, disobeying an officer's orders, driving with an expired license and having an open container of alcohol in her car — a flask of Jack Daniels whiskey in the glove compartment. She denied threatening to "call the Reagan's" or demand that Officer Paul Kramer be fired, and she called untrue allegations that she cursed Kramer during what she called a traumatic experience.

"I recall somebody chasing me like the Gestapo wanted to shoot me ... don't forget my grandmother was killed ... it's still in my blood."

Gabor admitted Tuesday that she scuffled with 6-foot-4-inch Kramer after he pulled her over for having expired license tags. But she said she acted in self-defense, giving him more of a pat than a slap. "Gabor stepped out of the witness box and lightly slapped Graysen to demonstrate. "I'm not stupid to hit a man with a gun in my face," she said.

Conference tries to put label on '80s

From Associated Press reports
BOSTON — It was billed as a gathering of world-renowned intellectuals tackling the loftiest of subjects and perhaps coming up with a metaphor for our times.

But while participants in the modestly named Conversazioni on Culture and Society considered changes in the Soviet Bloc, the influence of religion in world events and cultural illiteracy, the larger assignment proved elusive.

"Everybody was satisfied, but no final metaphor, alas, emerged," said Bernard Levin, chief columnist for The Times of London.

In an introduction to the conference, Claudio Veliz, a conference host, noted such past "eloquent and economical" tags as "Roaring 20s," "Neo-Gothic," and even "Cold War," but lamented that, "today we are encumbered with 'post-industrial' and 'post-modern,' usages as illuminating as 'post-life' is for death or 'post-opts' for porridge."

Levin, one of many academics, historians and others who joined a debate of world issues, did not seem defeated by the group's failure to write a tag line for the closing years of the 20th century.

"The whole idea is that we thrash out these things," he said.

The third annual conference, held this year at Boston University, brought together such thinkers as former presidential advisor Arthur Schlesinger Jr., Cambridge University professor Ernest Gellner and noted French historian Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie to work on "A Metaphor for Our Times."

The conference invited about 60 top thinkers.

"I don't think the idea of the metaphor was ... built into the idea," Levin said. "It was just a way of saying, 'What do we think of our condition?'"

In his presentation, Levin pointed to the drug epidemic, the collapse of form in the arts and "the old certainties vanishing and nothing being put in their place" to coin "The Age of Disorder."

The points he raised provoked considerable discussion and, he said, a degree of accord, particularly his position that cultural literacy would someday return.

"I had said that our time is the only one that would in fact try to define itself," he added. "Obviously any era, the 'Dark Ages,' the 'Age of Enlightenment,' is not called that when it happens."

"We're the first age to try and define itself right now, rather than waiting for history."

American economist Walt Rostow talked of the European Community's plans for dropping border restrictions in 1992 and offered "The Age of Regionalism."

Veliz, a professor at La Trobe University in Melbourne, Australia, focused on the domination of the English language and English culture throughout the world. He noted how soccer, or English football, is played throughout the world.
