Filmmakers invited for destruction

From Associated Press reports
DENVER — Denver has a deal for any movie producer with a script that involves blowing up a big bridge: Come use the 15th Street Viaduct.

Councilwoman Debbie Ortega, noting the rickety old structure is fated for demolition anyway, said it's probably the best way to get the job done at low cost to the city.

Officials casting for ways to attract the film industry to the state think the idea is wonderful.

"We're talking to the economic development people about writing a couple of ads for Variety and the trade papers," said Karol Smith, director of the Colorado Motion Picture and Television Advisory Commission. "Just to say something like, 'Does somebody want to blow up this bridge?'"

Ortega made the suggestion about two weeks ago at a reception the commission held for Hollywood production companies coinciding with the Aspen Film Festival.

Raisin' 'em honest in Louisiana

PINEVILLE, La. — When 11-year-old Misti Mathews bought an old dictionary at a garage sale, she found more than a wealth of information inside.

She found $370 in cash — including two $100 bills — stuffed into the middle of the book, said her mother, Carla Spurgeon. Spurgeon said her daughter was wide-eyed, and immediately wanted to return the money to its owner.

"She was really concerned about whose it was," Spurgeon said. "She never hesitated. She was never excited about keeping the money for herself."

"I just said we'd have to return it because it wasn't ours," Misti said. The family found that the dictionary belonged to Debra and Hank Tabor of Pineville, the daughter and son-in-law of the woman who held Saturday's garage sale.

"We were really surprised and grateful that the little girl would be so honest," Mrs. Tabor said.

"You don't find too many people that would do something like that anymore. We have a new baby. I hope we do as good with him."

She said her husband apparently placed the money in the dictionary for safekeeping years ago, and forgot about it.

Misti received a $40 reward for her good deed.

"And she almost had to be convinced to take that," Spurgeon said.

"I just told her (Mrs. Tabor) she didn't have to," Misti added.

Biography faces lawsuit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Armand Hammer, the 91-year-old chairman of Occidental Petroleum Co., has sued to stop publication of a biography in Europe and threatened to do likewise in the United States.

"Armand Hammer: The Untold Story" was written by University of Missouri journalism Professor Steve Weinberg, who says he interviewed nearly 700 people but got no cooperation from Hammer in his research. Weinberg says the book published by Little Brown is already on bookstore shelves and that efforts to halt publication now may actually stir interest in the biography.

Letters from Hammer's lawyers, obtained by The Wall Street Journal, termed the book "beyond redemption by correction" and said it was "riddled" with falsehoods.
