UNC to host interviews for Playboy

By NANCY WYKLE
Staff Writer

Playboy's plans for a "Girls of the ACC" issue is likely to draw protest against the magazine when photographer David Chan begins interviews at the Carolina Inn next week.

Chan will interview candidates for the April issue that will feature female students at universities in the ACC. The models selected for the spread will be paid $100 for a clothed shot, $250 for a semi-nude shot and $500 for a nude shot.

Malini Moorthy, co-president of the Campus Y, said a protest would be more likely to occur if the interviews were taking place on campus. But the Inn is owned by UNC.

"It saddens me that women on our campus will probably be willing to go to these interviews and to pose," Moorthy said.

Edward Rehkopf, director of University hotels and conferences, said he had not considered the possibility of the visit sparking protests. "He (the photographer) is a traveling member of the public, and we have no reason to exclude him."

Moorthy said she thought it might have a negative reflection on women attending ACC schools.

"It does upset me that it will be in reference to the ACC. That's a stereotype I'm sure the majority of women on our campus don't want to be identified with."

Elizabeth Norris, director of communications for Playboy, said usually 50 to 100 women apply, depending on the size of the school. Between 30 and 45 women will be selected to model for the issue, she said.

Groups that protest to protect women's rights hinder the rights of the women who want to model, Norris said.

Recruitment on college campuses usually draws a few protesters, but not enough to stop the interviews or prevent women from applying, she said.

"I think Playboy believes, 'what's wrong with being a sex object if that's not all you are?'"

The appearance of Chan at Duke University caused a protest, and a petition is now being circulated on campus. When interviews were conducted at N.C. State University, there was also a protest.

Professor in law school dies on leave in Alabama

By KENNY MONTEITH
Staff Writer

Nancy K. Rhoden, a professor for two years in the UNC School of Law, died Oct. 17 in Huntsville, Ala. She was 37.

According to law professor Donald Clifford, Rhoden committed suicide. Rhoden taught in the field of biomedical ethics of the law with emphasis on questions of abortion, pediatrics and obstetrics.

Nancy King, assistant professor in the School of Medicine, said Rhoden had a "regular schedule of meetings with people who do pediatrics and obstetrics."

"They met to discuss current cases and ethical issues," King continued. "She would provide a forum for talking about ethical problems that arise in these kinds of cases."

With the support of a National Endowment for the Humanities Fellowship, Rhoden was on leave from the University to study judicial bioethics. "She was on leave doing research and writing, mostly at UNC, but not exclusively," Clifford said.

"In bioethics in the law and morality in the law, she brought her extensive experience with medical personnel and medical problems."

"She was a focal point and a bridge between medical and legal problems with a special ethical perspective."

Clifford said Rhoden was very widely known throughout the country in her field because of her extensive writing and knowledge. Rhoden recently wrote an article, "Ethical and Legal Issues in Labor and Delivery," for the book "Management of Labor" which was to be published in 1988.

Rhoden was very respected by her students and colleagues, Clifford said. "The students thought very highly of her. She brought to bear her actual experience in making rounds in the hospital and dealing directly with medical personnel."

Clifford said she was "respected in particular for her great breadth and depth of scholarship that she engaged in."

Rhoden has taught courses in torts, bioethics and the law, and morality and the law, while also teaching in the School of Medicine.

She received her bachelor's de-

NCSU chancellor search off to quiet start at forum

By JULIE GAMMILL
Staff Writer

Students were scarce, and reporters outnumbered speakers at the N.C. State University Chancellor Search Committee's first open meeting Friday to hear what the public would like in a new chancellor.

Four NCSU faculty members and a Shaw University professor voiced concerns about women's issues, education and athletics in the search process before half of the committee's 14 members and a handful of audience members.

The committee is searching for an individual to replace former NCSU chancellor Bruce Poulton, who resigned earlier this semester amid controversy surrounding the university's athletics program. Larry Monteith, the former dean of NCSU's College of Engineering, is serving as interim chancellor until a permanent chancellor is chosen.

No students spoke at the hearing, and neither of the two student members of the committee, Student Body President Brian Nixon and Student Senate President Brooks Raiford, could attend.

Low student turnout may be a result of NCSU's fall break, which ended last Tuesday, and may have delayed campus publicity for the event, said William Simpson, executive secretary to the committee. He said he expected a higher overall turnout at the next two public hearings on Oct. 27 and Nov. 8.

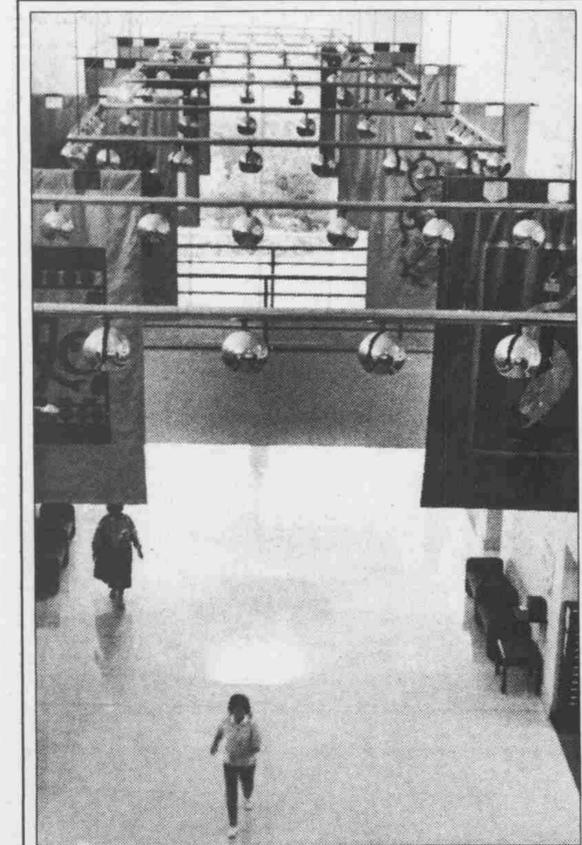

Although he was not disappointed with the student turnout, Raiford said the location and time of the meeting contributed to the lack of students. The committee met during classes Friday morning at the NCSU McKimmon Center, a conference building away from the main campus.

He has been encouraging students to attend the Nov. 8 open meeting planned for late afternoon at the NCSU Student Center, Raiford said. His efforts to publicize the open meetings among the student body prove the committee is interested in student opinion, he said.

At Friday's meeting, NCSU associate professor Barbara Risman, co-chair of the university's Council on the Status of Women, said the committee should "include a demonstrated commitment and concern for women's affairs as a criteria for any successful candidate for chancellor."

The committee should emphasize to See SEARCH, page 2

Education key to raising assault awareness

By MARK FOLK
Staff Writer

The number of rape and sexual assault reports on campus is lower than last year's total, but at least one official said these statistics could be misleading.

Kristina Groover, community education and outreach coordinator for the Orange County Rape Crisis Center, said 22 out of 135 reported sexual assaults, rapes and child sexual abuses in the county last year occurred on the UNC campus. This year, of the 92 reported incidents that have occurred, only four have been on campus, she said.

"I don't think it's due to a decrease in the number occurring. I think it's lack of reporting, and I'm not sure why that is happening."

The latest report of an on-campus incident was Oct. 7, when a female UNC student was raped at knife point in the upper level of the Craige parking lot.

The best way to get more victims to come forward and report incidents is education, Groover said.

"We are trying to educate the community to be more responsive to rape victims. If a victim feels she's got support from the community, she will be more likely to come forward."

Kathleen Benzaquin, associate dean of students, agreed, saying improvements in education have been made since the University emphasized promoting rape awareness four years ago. "I think that we are seeing results. The University has gotten behind us, and it's beginning to show."

Last July, the University added a section on racial and sexual harassment, date and acquaintance rape, and other sexual assaults to the Instrument of Student Judicial Governance. A student accused of such incidents can now be brought before the student honor court.

Benzaquin said this was a major step for UNC.

"A university has the responsibility to respond to the needs of its students. It's rare to see a school take a strong stance and speak out. We've taken the lead in doing this and it's exciting."

But Benzaquin said there was still a problem with encouraging victims of rape and sexual assault to come forward and get help.

One of the most obvious examples of this is the Student Stay fund, which was set up two years ago but has yet to be used, she said. Its purpose is to provide funds for assault or rape victims who need to stay in Student Health Services or North Carolina Memorial Hospital overnight. Benzaquin said the fund contained more than $1,200 — most of it coming from sororities.

"We set this up in hopes of encouraging more assault victims to come forward," she said. "But not enough

Student killed, 2 hurt in car wreck

From staff reports

A UNC junior was killed in a car accident Sunday on N.C. Highway 109, about a mile and a half south of Denton.

Nicholas Frank Geiger, 20, of 619 Colston St., Albemarle, and locally of 435 Hinton James Residence Hall, was driving south on N.C. Highway 109 around 11 a.m. when he lost control of his car, according to a report filed at the Lexington Highway Patrol Station by Trooper J.E. Stanley.

Two other people were also injured in the wreck.

Geiger's car started going from one lane to another, went off the right side of the pavement, and then went into the left lane and struck a car traveling north, the report said.

Stanley has indicated that Geiger's death was probably instantaneous.

Robertette Sharon Adams, 18, of P.O. Box 185, New London, a passenger in Geiger's car, was severely injured, according to the report. The Patient Information Office of Baptist Hospital in Winston-Salem said Tuesday that Adams, a UNC-Charlotte student, was in serious condition in the intensive-care unit.

The driver of the second car, Lauren Merrill Bray, 23, of 3301-H Walnut Creek Parkway, Raleigh, was also injured. Bray was released Monday from Community General Hospital in Thomasville.

The report indicated that all three involved in the accident were wearing seatbelts.

Stanley estimated damage to Geiger's 1988 car at $12,000, and damage to Bray's 1989 Honda at $13,000.

Geiger was a hall senator in Hinton James Residence Hall.
