Don't panic! Elvis is not digging at Graceland

From Associated Press reports

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — One thing the people at Elvis Presley's house never run short of is rumors, so they're putting out the word early that the digging set to begin Wednesday night at Graceland is nothing sinister.

Crews are resealing the basement wall, that's all, said Todd Morgan, a spokesman for the Presley residence and its souvenir shopping center.

The three-story, white-columned home, called Graceland, draws 600,000 tourists a year. Rumors that Presley, who died 12 years ago, was alive set off a flurry of reported Elvis sightings a year or so ago.

Whenever construction projects get under way at Graceland, the phones start ringing, Morgan said. "The simplest of household chores at Graceland become international headlines."

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The Statehouse painting of the two Rhode Islanders who signed the Declaration of Independence is perfect in every detail — except one of the faces is of the wrong person.

An error dating to 1823 caused Pennsylvania statesman John Dickinson to end up in former Rhode Island Gov. Stephen Hopkins' spot in the portrait that hangs outside the House speaker's office.

The mistake was discovered more than a decade ago, but no one did anything about it until Hopkins' descendants kicked up a fuss.

It finally will be fixed today with the unveiling of a new portrait — but Rhode Islanders will have to settle for a picture of Hopkins' son, Rufus.

"Amazing," said Kathryn O'Hare, spokeswoman for Secretary of State Kathleen Connell, whose office is in charge of Statehouse tours and guidebooks. "It's kind of comical, actually."

Stephen Hopkins left no portraits behind when he died in 1785, and when artist John Trumbull sought him out seven years later for inclusion in his famous painting of the signers of the declaration, he had to settle for Rufus Hopkins. Townspeople assured Trumbull that the son closely resembled the father.

Feast for fowl

CHICAGO — Susan Wells is for the birds — and she's proud of it.

Mrs. Wells and her husband, Ralph, count themselves among 82.5 million Americans who feed their wild, feathered friends at least once a week.

But the couple said many people aren't clear about when to feed birds, what kinds of birds to feed or how much they should eat, so they formed a society last month to share tips.

"Our goal is to make these people as well-educated as we can," said Mrs. Wells, who is executive director of the National Bird-Feeding Society based in suburban Northbrook.

"It's kind of an overlooked subject, if you stop and think about it."
