Abortion rights decision questioned

By SHANNON O'GRADY
Staff Writer

Although abortion is now legal in North Carolina and the state government provides limited funding, the 1989 Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services decision may call into question legal abortion rights, resulting in a possible change of state law.

According to N.C. law, an abortion is now legal if it occurs within the first 20 weeks of pregnancy. The abortion must be performed by a physician licensed to practice medicine in North Carolina.

A woman also can receive a legal abortion before the 20th week of pregnancy in a facility certified by the Department of Human Resources. After the 20th week, an abortion is legal only if continuing the pregnancy would threaten the life or endanger the health of the mother.

In 1985, the state abortion fund was granted $924,500 to reimburse licensed physicians and hospitals who provided legal abortions. The Department of Human Resources, Division of Health Services, received $450,000 for prenatal care. The funds were appropriated to applicants who met at least one of the following eligibility requirements:

- women who received money from Families with Dependent Children.

ABORTION DEBATE

■ women who received health support services in association with protective services and disabled adults.

■ women whose yearly income was $4,226 or below.

In addition, all women were only eligible for state funds if their abortion was performed because of adverse circumstances such as rape, incest or fetal deformity. Women also could receive funds if a physician determined the pregnancy would impair their health or if they were mentally retarded.

The provisions of the 1985 abortion fund limitations remained in effect until 1989 when the funds were cut to $424,000.

Now, additional changes in N.C. abortion laws are pending in both the N.C. House of Representatives and the state Senate.

N.C. House Bill 93 would require women under age 18 to receive parental or judicial consent before having an abortion. A minor can have an abortion without parental consent if the courts believe she is well-informed about the issue and thus able to make her own decision. She also can get a parental consent waiver if the court determines it would be in the best interest of the minor not to inform her parents. If a minor is a victim of incest, she does not need parental permission.

The court would be required to ensure complete confidentiality for the minor and would render a decision about whether she could receive a parental consent waiver within seven days of the application filing. The minor would not be responsible for the court costs involved in waiving parental consent.

The bill also would allow for parental consent to be waived in medical emergencies when an immediate abortion is required to save the mother's life. Any person who performs an abortion for a minor without parental consent would be guilty of a misdemeanor, according to House Bill 93.

N.C. Rep. Paul Stam, R-62nd District, is one of the leading sponsors of House Bill 93. With his support, the bill passed in the N.C. House of Representatives and was sent to the Senate Judiciary and Appropriations Committee.

Stam said an agreement between the House and Senate on parental consent could help reduce the number of abortions in North Carolina. "One way to decrease abortion is to decrease pregnancy. Parents are already responsible for children in every other way until they are 18."

Several other states, including Minnesota, South Carolina and Utah, have already passed laws requiring minors to receive parental consent before having abortions. Minnesota passed a consent law in 1981. According to the Minnesota Department of Health, the pregnancy rate of girls between the ages of 12 and 17 has decreased by 27 percent. The abortion rate of this age group has decreased by 34 percent.

Stam and N.C. Rep. Michael Decker, R-29th District, are sponsoring another House bill that is now in committee. The bill could come before the General Assembly during the short session in May, potentially changing state abortion laws.

The bill would require a physician to perform and keep records of extensive medical examinations before a patient could have an abortion. The examination would include determining the age, weight and lung maturity of the unborn child. The physician would use the information to decide the viability of the fetus.

The bill defines viability as "that stage of fetal development when the life of the unborn child may be continued indefinitely outside the womb by natural or artificial life-support systems."

The use of public funds, resources or facilities in performing abortions, other than those cases in which the mother's life is jeopardized, or for financing counseling that encourages an abortion would be prohibited if the bill passed.
