Harassment

harassed, there is more sexual harassment occurring than reported, Perot said. "They (women) experience far more than what they report," she said.

But, Perot said a behavior has to make a person feel uncomfortable or create a hostile environment for the behavior to be sexual harassment.

"If a person's being treated in a certain way, and they don't think it's sexual harassment, it's not," Perot said.

That treatment still may be inappropriate, she said. Professors and bosses could commit many actions which could be sexual harassment because they are in positions of power, she said.

Lizandaa Gillespie, a freshman from New Jersey, disagreed. The examples of sexual harassment she gave were: if a professor constantly made lewd remarks like "babe" or "sweetie;" if they made generalities like insisting women were only good for housekeeping or if a faculty or staff member touched someone in areas where a person didn't want to be touched.

She said that someone was sexually harassed even if that person didn't see it as sexual harassment.

"I think that sexual harassment exists even if it's not obvious to you," she said.

Guthrie said that if construction workers jeered at a woman as she ran past, it's still sexual harassment even if the woman didn't find it offensive.

"Some women may think that makes them feel special, but to me it still is sexual harassment."

Kathleen Benzaquin, assistant dean of students, said that last year was the first year the Dean of Students Office recorded sexual harassment complaints. There were 35 complaints made to the office, but they were dealt with informally, she said.

The Rape Action Project has been organized to educate people on campus about the problem of sexual harassment, Benzaquin said. It is a student organization where students give presentations at residence halls in which they define sexual harassment, demonstrate scenarios, show films, go over the UNC policy and make students aware of the services available to them, Benzaquin said.

The UNC grievance policy on sexual harassment suggests two avenues of action for someone who has been sexually harassed, O'Melia said. A person can deal with it in an informal way, which is the route the University encourages, or they can file a formal complaint, she said.

The informal procedure involves approaching the supervisor of the department and making that person aware of the offensive behavior so that the supervisor can reprimand the staff or faculty member, she said. The University suggests sexual harassment be dealt with informally because this process will protect those involved, she said.

"Confidentiality seems to be important for people reporting it," she said. The formal grievance procedure involves filing a complaint with the grievance committee if you are a member of the staff, or filing a formal complaint with the student honor court if you are a student, O'Melia said.

A student cannot file a formal and an informal complaint at the same time, she said. After the formal complaint is filed, there is an investigation and a confidential report is filed with the University. For staff, disciplinary measures are taken, O'Melia said.

O'Melia said she was giving sexual harassment presentations to departments requesting them and would train teaching assistants in the fall.

Right now she said she wanted to establish programs, get the word out and help to resolve sexual harassment complaints as they came up. The programs will be one-hour training sessions to inform people of what sexual harassment is and what their options are to deal with it, she said.

"It's an ongoing problem, and I think that's why it's important that it's an ongoing process."

Benzaquin said that when a person made a sexual harassment complaint informally, it wasn't to hush up the incident, but to protect the confidentiality of both parties. She said it was not informal in terms of no record of the complaint because even an informal complaint must be filed with the Affirmative Action office.

"So, it's not where someone can just kind of sweep it under the rug." The Dean of Students Office offers many services to those who have been sexually harassed in terms of recommending counselors and assigning them counselors, she said.

Benzaquin said that sometimes in a University situation, cultural differences existed that made a person unaware they were harassing someone.

Sexual harassment has a cumulative effect, she said. "It may not be that it's one joke, but it's just day after day of listening to those jokes," she said. "The effect can be very different from what the intent was."

Men also can be sexually harassed, Benzaquin said. When women stereotype or demean men in class, it is sexual harassment, she said.

Guthrie said 3 to 4 percent of the victims at the Orange County Rape Crisis Center were men. They were raped by other men, she said. Men's bodies also have become objects in today's society, she said.

Douglas Ramirez, a senior from Lincolnton, said men were just as likely to be sexually harassed, but it wasn't heard about as much for men "because women have to fight for their positions in society."

Men don't come forward because of the male ego taboo, Ramirez said. "It's his masculinity put on the line," Ramirez said. He said that people would wonder why a man wouldn't want to be harassed.

When working as a teenager at a Pizza Hut, Ramirez said that the female manager would walk through the cook area and put her hands on the men's butts. He said he didn't like that behavior, especially not in a business.

"Sexual harassment doesn't have to be so much as in sexual," Ramirez said. "It can also be in mentality as in your gender, like 'because I'm a man, I cannot make good decisions.'"
