Town manager will begin search to replace 25-year veteran Gold

By Liz Parker
 Staff Writer

As Chapel Hill Police Chief Arnold Gold's retirement date approaches, town officials are searching for someone to take his place.

After 25 years of service in the Chapel Hill Police Department, Gold announced in October that he would step down Feb. 1.

Town Manager Cal Horton, responsible for the appointment of a new chief, said he would begin soliciting applications for the position before the end of the month. He will accept applications until the beginning of 1992.

"We will use traditional assessment devices in selecting the best candidate,"

Horton said.

Horton said his main focus in the selection process would be the "basic values of the individual applicant."

Chapel Hill has values different from those of other communities, Horton said, and he hopes to find a candidate whose values match those of the community.

"I hope we have a representative sample of candidates to apply," Horton said.

"We expect some good local candidates as well as candidates from elsewhere in the state."

Jane Cousins, Chapel Hill police spokeswoman, said that the division of Chapel Hill's Public Safety Department into separate fire and police departments would have little effect on the police chief's job.

Cousins said entry-level positions on the force would be subject to significant reforms under the new system, but higher-level positions such as police chief and fire chief will remain largely the same.

Horton said Tuesday that he didn't anticipate any problems with the transition to a new chief.

Betsy Harris, selection recruitment officer for Chapel Hill, said, "The case of the transition will depend on the person selected."

Horton said he was sorry Gold was retiring.

"If I could choose anyone I wanted for the position of police chief, I'd appoint him."

What The Chronicle prints is a representation of the university community," said ASDU member Barry Saurfield.

In denouncing The Chronicle's decision to print the ad, ASDU members said they were acting on behalf of the entire student body.

"What we need to do is represent the student body at large," said Matt Gephart, a co-sponsor of the bill. "We are trying to focus on what we understand to be The Chronicle's ad policy."

Much of the debate during Tuesday's meeting centered around The paper's advertising policy and whether that policy was broken by the printing of Smith's ad.

The Chronicle's ad manager, Elizabeth Wyatt, said the paper's only formal ad policies exist in the paper's constitution and in a packet sent to prospective advertisers.

"There are no more stated, written-down guidelines," Wyatt said. "We try to use our own judgment about what we feel is best for the newspaper"

Although most members were satisfied with the denouncement of The Chronicle's actions, some said the bill was weak and did not solve problems the ad created.

"They should apologize, they should give money to Holocaust awareness groups and those responsible for the decision to run the ad should resign," said Elsborg.
