

Men's golf goes West in quest for NCAA championship

It wasn't nearly as bad as it seemed. Granted, the North Carolina men's golf team, which finished second in the country last spring, placed no higher than second in its four fall tournaments.

But just consider this: Junior Tom Scherrer, an honorable mention All-American last spring who tied for fourth in last season's NCAA Championships, did not participate this past fall. Instead, he sat out to compete on the U.S. Walker Cup Team and to play in the British Amateur.

Junior Bill Smith, winner of last spring's Ping/American Intercollegiate tournament, missed several fall rounds because of a nagging back injury.

Couple the return of these two key individuals with the experience others on the already strong team gained while Scherrer and Smith were out, and you have the makings of another potential national championship team.

So who held the team together while these two were out? Without a doubt, it was senior Pat Moore. A second-team All-American from Bismarck, N.D., Moore has won six collegiate tournaments since coming to UNC. He won two this past fall and held the team's lowest stroke average (72.10).

Moore sees himself as a team leader, but said the sport of golf was not conducive to a leadership position.

"You can't be out there being a cheerleader like you can in football or lacrosse," he said. "I try to lead by example more than anything. I try to be the first one out there practicing every day. I try to work the hardest out of everybody, and if somebody can pick that up and see that I'm working hard, maybe they'll work hard too."

Moore also indicated that a sense of family on the team aided leadership.

"I think we just try to be as close as we can. Friendship is basically where leadership comes from."

Obviously, UNC head coach Devon Brouse has been pleased with Moore's play. But he has perhaps been more
