HIV virus but that most staff members did submit to testing.

"The employee is required by policy to report his or her health status to the hospital," Mandel said. "A panel reviews the worker's history and makes a decision on how to deal with the situation."

Munson said the worker was still on hospital staff, but his or her duties have been limited. "We have known about this situation for 10 days. We felt that it was our ethical and moral responsibility to our patients to notify the media and further education about this virus."

Dr. Fred Sparling, chairman of the department of medicine, said the media could have a two-sided effect. "(Coverage) could cause unnecessary fear and panic in the public ... from a situation that had virtually no risk," he said. "But, on the other hand, we could see the public becoming more aware of this disease."

Pollitt

"I decided to become a lawyer probably because both of my parents were lawyers," he said.

Pollitt went to Cornell University for law school but left for Europe after his second year. After serving in the Marine Corps for three years in the Pacific during World War II, Pollitt returned to finish law school. He worked in the Washington, D.C., Court of Appeals, where he began struggling to further civil rights with United Auto Workers.

"I worked in the fight for the rights of the black fireman in D.C. who was being phased out of a job because of increasing technology," he said.

Pollitt said he worked nights in teaching and decided that he enjoyed it. He came to North Carolina because of segregation and racial tension, he said.

"When I came to North Carolina, I found that segregation was present within the schools, and I think I successfully changed that."
