

The New Forest Theatre Which Will Open With "Romeo and Juliet" Tonight

The new Forest Theatre in part of the cost. Battle Park, which will have its opening tonight (Friday) when the Playmakers give a performance of "Romeo and Juliet," was built by the University with the aid of the W.P.A. The W.P.A. put in about $20,000, the greater supervised by A. R. Hollett, University engineer, and his assistant, J. C. Little. There are stone seats to accommodate 1,000 spectators, stone side-walls, stone towers for the play-director and the light-director, and stone walls enclosing the stage. All these masses of stone are bare now; but they are going to be covered with ivy or some other evergreen, and then they will look a lot better.

The man in the accompanying picture of the new theatre, with the dog beside him, is Frederick H. Koch, chief of the Carolina Playmakers.

Mr. Koch came to the University in 1918. With the help of W. C. Coker he established the Forest Theatre—which wasn't a building but simply a hillside where people sat on the ground and looked down on a flat space called a stage. The Forest Theatre stayed just that way—except that there were some improvements in the stage—until the present structure was put up.
