Dr. Guy Phillips Addresses Teachers

"In the midst of a world of many ideas, gadgets and material servants, there is danger of getting lost," Guy B. Phillips, professor emeritus in the University School of Education, stated Monday night to 700 teachers of home economics, meeting in Greensboro. "The emerging calls to meet the demands of the space age, the changing industrial patterns, and the threats of social revolution offer the teacher a real opportunity to lead," he said. "Team teaching, teaching machines, television, audio-visual aids, and new teaching techniques tend to confuse the person without a good sense of direction."

According to Dr. Phillips, there are five criteria for the good teaching that we need so much today. Besides having a keen sense of direction, teachers must have a sense of perspective, "a broad overview of society and its needs rather than a narrow textbook concept." The third essential is a sense of responsibility. "The true teacher must be a defender of children against shortsighted economic policy, political expediency and limited professional outlook."

Dr. Phillips said the teacher must enjoy a sense of confidence and security. "The salesman sells when he believes he can sell and fails when he is frightened by his task."

"In the last place," Dr. Phillips concluded, "there must be a sense of humility which makes teaching a servant of the learner. There is no place for sarcasm and dictatorship. . . Great teachers are humble in the face of their pupils and of their task."
