Back to the Old Home Once More, In the golden glow of the setting sun

There it lay, nestled down by a hill;

The soft, gray shadows fell here and there On green meadow and running rill, I saw the fields of golden grain; I heard the caws and song of bird; But at the door where the hollybooks grow I haard no welcoming word,

I straved out in the orchard fair; Old trees stretched their arms to mo, As if they would say, we remember you well, And they whispered these words to me; Have you back the hopes of youth?

Are your castles people I with lifer Is your heart as brave and full of gleet Were no dreams crushed out in the strife? With its pages just as clean As in the days, when a child, you playe Ere the years drifted in between?

Is life as fair as in the days You gathered the flowers sweet? Are none of the pages blotted or stained In the book that will soon be completed The old home lays fair in the moonlight, As it falls on the waving grain; But the old tolks are gone, and the green
