The other class, consisting of planters and important business men, was fairly wealthy, with the means of wealth always within their reach; they were able to give their children the best educational advantages, and to surround them in their homes with comforts and luxuries. Both classes reproduced themselves as the generations followed each other, almost without change. The poor whites remained poor whites, and the young men grew up to be like their fathers. The rich and prosperous remained rich and prosperous, and the sons succeeded to the advantages of the fathers. The sons of the lower class, without education, still were educated to believe that they were to be nothing more than their fathers, and that they existed mainly to fill the gap between the negroes and the ruling whites.
