More than once we bave suggested that one of the good results of the free rural mail delivery system, will be the tendency to make the country people more content with their surroundings. This we have tried to point out, will have the tendency to stop the moving o the towns and cities.

Congressman John D. Bellamy was in Raleigh a few days ago, and being interviewed by a News and Observer eporter he expressed the following opinion of the rural delivery service

"I have become an ardent advocate of this service. For the last thirty years there has arisen a disposition in our country people to leave the farms and flock to the towns. Many allege their reason is to get the benefit of daily mails and better school privileges. Now since the educational awakening has come over our State, we have the schools in the country. and now with rural free delivery we have the daily mails, thus making the country as desirable to live in as the

'I believe we can look for much improvement in the country when the farmer boys and girls become satisfied with their homes, which have all the advantages of town life."

It has been given out that the fire insurance companies have arbitrarily raised the rate on fire insurance in North Carolina 25 per cent. In view Practices wherever his services are of the fact that the insurance companies baye made large profits from their business in North Carolina during the past few years and ought to reduce their rates rather than increase them, there is a strong disposition in the State to foster home companies and thus save the money to our own people.

The losses by fire in North Carolina have been less during 1901 than for any year since the Insurance Department has been established. The ratio of loss went as low as 40, whereas three years ago it was 60.

These figures speak trumpet-tongued against the arbitrary increase of the ought to secure a reversal of the order imposing the increase. If in three years the profits on fire insurance business has licen $2,000,000, why should not North Carolina have more home companies? By encouraging home companies the people are building up agencies that will save them from large increases which follow large losses in great Northern cities."

THE ETHIOPIAN CONVERTED

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

We may never know how the dusky proselyte was first converted to the of so many people from the country Hebrew faith. The Jews were already scattered far and wide, especially in the you know?" The wit of Philip was capitals and commercial centers of the world. Ther, as now, they were money-lenders. Perhars it was in his pel. capacity as treasurer of the Abyssinian Empire he came in contact with some first-century Rothschild, who was intent upon doing good as well as getting a high premium on his money. Over the bonds and consuls the Hebrew may have peered into the Ethiopian's heart, and, discovering its noble traits, coveted them for God. He may have paved the way to conversation by unfolding the miraculous history of Israel, in which no intellligent person falls to be ir terested, and of whose truth few, if any, candid minds fail to be con-

Or the motives of the unknown proselyter may have been mixed, or even wholly bad. He may have been buke. But whatever the incentive of the sectarist may have been, the prose lyte was a notable and noble accession to the Hebrew Church.

He showed the genuineness of his conversation by the long journey, which he took at his first opportunity to the seat of his newfound faith. It was some three thousand miles to Je rusalem and back. Yet this happy convert, to whom tradition gives the name of Judich, hesitated not at the toil and expense. As his chariot rolled along the banks of the Nile, under pyramid, and by temple and treasure-city, no doubt thought, if he did not exclaim: "This is that Egypt where God did those wonders for his people, and for which he delivered them with an outstretced

Another evidence of the depth and sincerity of his interest was the length of time he tarried in Jerusalem. He had gone up to the Feast of Pentecost but we find him staying on through the martyrdom of Stephen and the conversation of Samaria-not, how ever, that he was concerned in these events, even if he was aware of them. Still a stronger evidence: He pur chased a copy of the Hebrew Scrip ures; and it cost him a small fortune no doubt. It was to be no center-table ornament in his Nubian palace, either It was for use. Indeed he could not wait until he reached home; but, in his jolting chariot on that rough Judaan road, he was reading, not sel fishly to himself either, but out loud so that his charioteer and whole cavalcade might have the advantage.

There goes the Bible-reading Ethiopan. But now another person breaks in upon the scene. How strange -unreasonable, in fact—the providen ces of God often appear! The revival in Samaria was at its height. Its gen uineness had been confirmed by the apostles in the bestowal of miraculous gifts. It seemed as if no one could shepherd the converts so well as the evangelist who had first brought them to Christ. But the Spirit called Philip rates in North Carolina, and they away, and that, too, not to another populous city, but to a desert way.

In this incident it is as if the curtain were lifted, and we could see the hand of God shaping events according to his will. The paths of these two men-the devout and inquiring nobleman and the holy evangelist-are made to converge. They come into actual conjuction at the precise moment when the nobleman's eye is on the passage which, more than any other, contains the gist of the gospel. his hand upon the fender of my car-And the Spirit said to Philip: "Go near and join thysell to this cla The man who, the day before, had giv en instant obedience to the unaccountable command of the Spirit, and had exchanged the stirring scenes and opportunities of a great awakening for a solitary post on a road through a desert, did not hesitate now, though he could plainly see that the traveler was prince and a foreigner.

There was a witticism, a play on words, in Philip's address to the Ethiopian, which is lost in the translation. He said: "Do you know what the edge of the wedge that opened the Nubian prince's heart wide to the gos-

The question anticipated a negative answer, and received it: "How can I, except some man should guide me?" The Ethiopian is a lovely example of the sincere inquirer after truth, No penknife of a destructive critic was in his hand. Nor was he asking with Pilate's cold superciliousness, "What is truth?" He had become a little child-docile, loving, trustful, of whom Jesus said, "Of such is the kingdom."

He bade the charlot stand still. He took up the tramp, covered with the sweat and dust of his long and hasty journey afoot. He seated him upon the gorgeous upholstery of his Egyptian charlot, and, oblivious to the fact that the eyes of all his attendants were upon him, he bent over the old yellow Septuagint manuscript with the unknown and wayfaring man. The place where he was reading was, "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter," and his utter confusion of mind was betrayed by the question, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this-of himself or of some other man?"

Then Philip opened his mouth, tak ing that very yerse as a text, and (liter ally) "declared to him the glad tidings, Jesus." The Ethiopian saw, believed, was baptized. That chariot was transmuted into a car of salvation. On it rolled, with its load more precious than the ivory and gold of a continent It rolled a thousand miles up the Nile, and carried the gospel to the heart of Nubia, where, in spite of the unfriendiest environment, it has remained intrenched ever since.

No motives of policy control his action. He does not question, "What would my royal misress say: "How would this affect my tenure of office?" He put his light on the lampstand offthe palace. In its shining his queenly mistress and all her subjects may have found life.

Last time I ever saw Bishop Simpson was on a train, returning from a session of a Conference. The car was crowded with preachers. There was the usual fusillade of wit and argument. The bishop was oblivious to all. Turned toward the window, and under reading a little, well-worn Bib'e. The Bible is the best of traveling companions. . . .
