TURNING THE TABLE. Or Making the Boot Fit the Other Foot.

THE office boy meditatively pushed the call button.

A moment later, in response to the call, the president of the corporation entered and respectfully approached the office boy's desk.

"Did you wish to see me, Tommy?" asked the president timidly.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Monypeny. Take a seat. I'll be through with this novel in a few minutes. I want to talk to you."

"The president sat down as directed. The office boy finished the alluring tale of how Black Black, the "chocolate detective," saved the heroine.

"Mr. Monypeny," he began, "what I have to say to you is important, and, while it is not pleasant, I want you to know that I have nothing personal against you."

"But the situation is just this: This concern has not been doing as well as it ought. You know that, of course, as well as I do."

"Yes, I know." "Well, then, you know that something must be done, and I suppose it might as well be done soon as late."

"The president looked worried. 'You're not going to get rid of me, are you, Tommy?' he inquired.

"No," replied the office boy, fidgeting a little on a pad before him. "No," he repeated slowly.

"Of course not," admitted Mr. Monypeny. "Then that leaves the dividends as the only department in which we can retrench, does it not?"

"It looks that way," agreed the president reluctantly. "It certainly does," pursued the office boy, with an air of finality.

"But, Tommy, it would be unfair to interfere with dividends at this time. You know I have just bought a big country place and an extra automobile, and it takes a lot of money to run them."

"But I didn't know it," argued the office boy. "I had hoped it wouldn't be necessary. But, come! After all it isn't so bad. You ought to be glad I am not going to dispense with you altogether."

"I suppose I'll have to." "That's the manly way to talk. And you'll find it won't be so bad. There are lots of ways you can economize, don't you know?"

"Thank you, Tommy," said the president politely as he turned away. "You are entirely welcome, Mr. Monypeny."—Ellis O. Jones in Life.

KEEP THE AIR PURE. Badly Ventilated Rooms are Bad Things For a Person's Health.

"I'm always half dead in the morning," "I never get up my strength until nearly noon."

"I don't feel rested in the morning; I'm as tired when I get up as when I go to bed," etc., are very common expressions among women.

Permitting this kind of sleep without making every effort to remedy it is slow murder of which no mother should be guilty.

Breathing bad air, or rebreathing air, reduces all the process of the body, and lessens vitality.

"To every air cell is given a blood vessel, bringing blood from the heart. It leaves the heart charged with carbonic acid and watery vapor."

It returns pure, if pure air has met it in the lungs, with all corruption destroyed, a dancing particle of life, but to be life and not slow death, thirty-three hogheads of air and twenty-eight pounds of blood must pass daily in to the lungs and back again three times each hour.

It rests with ourselves whether this tide shall exchange its poisonous and clogging carbonic acid and watery vapor for life-giving oxygen or retain it to weight down and debilitate every nerve in the body."

While she gets up in the morning she would feel newly made, rested and refreshed by her night's sleep, and if this is not the case the question of ventilation of the bedroom should be looked into.

Every night light consumes a large amount of oxygen; incubator lights are worse than the average lamp for this drain on the available supply.

In our towns people are beginning to sleep outdoors, on sleeping porches or in tents during the summer.

Once accustomed to sleeping with an abundance of fresh air, one will not be able to sleep in stuffy, closed bedrooms. If very sensitive to cold, get a board the precise width of the window and five or six inches high, then raise the sash, putting this board under it, and an upper current of air will be created which help purify the room.

Children who sleep in well-ventilated rooms do not get up cross in the morning.—Walace's Farmer.

Buy it now. Now is the time to buy a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. It is almost certain to be needed before the summer is over.

"Yes, Charley is as brave as a stack of lions. Did you hear about his darning a policeman to arrest him?"

"No! Go! What happened?" "He was arrested."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Accused of Stealing. E. E. Chamberlain, of Clinton, Me., boldly accuses Bucklen's Arnica Salve of stealing—the sting from burns or scalds—the pain from sores of all kinds—the distress from boils or piles.

"Is robs cuts, corns, bruises, sprains and injuries of their terror," he says, "as a healing remedy its equal don't exist." Only 25c at E. T. Whitehead Company's.
