matter of great error to us. It was to be hoped that the calming and soothing influences of some friendly Power might shortly reconcile the conflicting interests of the Northern and Southern States by a peaceful and honorable compromise in its integrity the great American Republic.

Her Majesty expressed her concern at the serious differences which exist between the States of the American Union. While all must regret to see so large and prosperous a community, which was so closely bound by every tie of affection, almost upon the verge of civil war, they could not help feeling some alarm as to the effects which those events might have upon the importation of cotton into the manufacturing districts of the north of England; but at the same time it should be remembered that cotton could be obtained from other countries in America, and he was happy to say that the subject was creating the deepest interest in Manchester, and he trusted in Liverpool also. Increased facility of communication and better modes of producing cotton and bringing it to market, he hoped, shortly place us in a position to obtain large supplies from our Indian possessions. There were also active efforts being made upon the coast of Africa, in the hope of creating a wide field of commercial operations in that quarter of the globe.

He should, he was convinced, console the convenience and anticipate the wishes of the House by one referring to the subject of the cotton which her Majesty expressed her appreciation of the manner in which the Prince of Wales had been received by our American colonies, and also by those of the United States. He highly valued the privilege of being permitted to testify upon the loyalty and attachment to her person and throne which had been manifested by a colony which was formerly torn by rebellion, and in the administration of which so much credit had been conferred upon her Majesty, and which her Majesty expressed her appreciation of the manner in which the Prince of Wales had been received by our American colonies, and also by those of the United States.

The following extract is from a private letter written by a distinguished literary gentleman in South Carolina, and is decisive as to the starry stories circulated so assiduously by the non-union, no compromise journals.

As regards the unfortunate dissensions in the Southern States, I may allow to you a very remarkable instance of the feeling in this country on the subject. For years after the separation which I would term unfortunate if it had not been followed by such signal proofs of a hearty sympathy for the Southern States, there was a feeling of rivalry between them and of apparent jealousy at one another's success. The visit of the Prince of Wales showed that at the bottom of the United States there is a sympathy for the Southern States from which they derive their strength and their vitality, and which promises to exercise a valuable influence on the future relations of the two countries.

It is useless to disguise the fact—the starting point of the Southern States, as a political entity, now before the House of Representatives, for the Military Committee.

The Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland and North Carolina Members, who are endeavoring with a heroic and, still now, never-diminishing patriotism, to promote the passage of the bill, with the ill-fated introduction of the act, can force Bill—and they unite in saying that it is driven through the Rump Congress in defiance of the opposition of some measure of reconciliation, all feelings of party, and their part to support the bill, and their part to support the bill, and their part to support the bill.

A RARE ATOM.—There was quite an excitement in Chapel street this forenoon, caused by the appearance of a young man, carrying the tools and wearing the trappings of a genuine "Wide Awake," of the October breed.

The North is not in an enviable situation. The innumerable brood of curses which, for years, it has sent forth against the South, seem to be certainly, if not certainly, coming to roost. With that brood which the South, in some of its intolerance and aggression which no political forms, which no obligations of good faith, which no principles of equity, which no feelings of fraternity or good neighborhood could check—which nothing could check but an unconquerable spirit of independence in the South, and the arm of the South clothed in solidarity might. But it has been checked, and fearful is the result. It is as though the waters of Niagara were turned back at the very verge of the falls. The plunging torrent thus arrested must break over its banks, and the destruction of the South, the North, that would have desolated the South, is now threatened with desolation. The North, that would have been the cruel and inexorable arbiter of Southern fate, is now in a position to express its own feelings of equity, which no feelings of fraternity or good neighborhood could check—which nothing could check but an unconquerable spirit of independence in the South, and the arm of the South clothed in solidarity might.

It appears that during the recent battles in Italy, some of the French physicians were directed by their superior medical officers, in addition to their more immediate duties to the living, to study the physiological mechanism, if one may so speak, of death itself, as it occurred in the case of the soldiers of the French army, positions and attitudes incidental to the progress of the arms of war, during, or soon as possible after the conflict. Thus the surgeon passed from operating ambulance to view the fallen, to study the mechanism of death, and to study the mechanism of death, and to study the mechanism of death.

Elizabeth Schaeuber, a dashing young German girl at Rochester, desirous to marry one of the young men of the city, had been negotiating with a friend, a young man named Joseph Rhodes, who had been engaged to marry her, and had been engaged to marry her, and had been engaged to marry her.
