Bulwer, Carlyle and Dickens. In a late German work, Werter and Weiter, appears the following interesting gossip on several literary celebrities of England :

"Bulwer lives in his beautiful villa in Fulham—a quiet, lonely village above London. A tranquility disturbed by nothing reigns in the house. Notwithstanding the warm spring day, Bulwer sits near the fireplace, where a bright coal fire is burning. Outside, the branches of a cherry tree, covered with an exuberance of blossoms, hang down on the window, and the low, chirping notes of the birds penetrate into the room.

The celebrated author -a tall, slender silken morning gown, which is fastened notification. with a strong cord around his waist-sits at his large empty table, and has before him only a blank book, in which he writes his a reference to General Orders No. 104, published new novels. His large, light blue eyes cast | below this, the Quarantine which has been eslonging glances out of the window; his tablished at the different parts of North and auburn hair flows in ringlets down on his South Carolina, since March 27th, 1867, has been high, narrow forehead; the large, slender suspended until further orders: nose hangs over his small mouth, and his red whiskers fall from his long and narrow chin on his breast. The whole face looks decidedly too long. He has a sickly appearance, and is abstracted. His family affairs are at the bottom of his melancholy, which no one can fail to perceive. His little daughter died; his son, the heir of his baronetcy, is estranged from him; and his wife, Lady Bulwer, has long since been separated from him, and lives in the city.

Let us enter her room. She sits at her writing table, for she is likewise at work upon a novel. Her corpulent form, her round face, her radiant, deep blue eyes, her raven hair, everything forms a striking contrast with the appearance of her husband. She contemplates the portrait of her son; the pretty sitting room of his wife debts.cheeks contain a number of dimples, such as daughters, and yet she is much over forty. A. M., and at 71 o'clock P. M. On thinking of this our suspicions are aroused; the crimson on her cheeks is too fragrant; the heavy braids surmounting her forehead are too black; her manners are deeidedly too kind and polite, and cannot be sincere. We escape from her, bearing in mind the bleeding heart of her melancholy husband, and the mournful tone of his

But let us pass on. We reach another quiet village, Chelsea. On the lawn, in one of the small gardens, sits Scotland's celebrated author, Thomas Carlyle. He has a into vacancy. His is a dry, gaunt form; he wears a morning-gown and cap, and draws heavy clouds of smoke from his short clay pipe; he is the Diogenes of Chelsea. It you converse with him, he is at first dry and laconic. He conducts you.

Mrs. Carlyle is a lively, pleasant creature, and a world of thought beams from her dark eyes. She has learned a great deal; her father gave her a most profound education, and she is possessed of a keen, yet mild judgment, of which her husband himself is afraid. But there she sits now, sewing with her handsome fingers a new cravat for her Diogenes. She wears an elegant morning costume.

In these surroundings we begin to feel at ease. The portraits of Goethe, young and to listen to him, but you must beware of interrupting him, and, above all, of contradicting him. He resembles a clear-sounding bell; you touch it and it resounds, but only prominent tobacco manufacturer, have been | to itself. Nevertheless, we Germans are always well at ease in Carlyle's presence, for if there is an Englishman who esteems and

Let us now go to Charles Dickens. There are several aristocratic carriages and plain hacks in front of his elegant residence, where a numerous party is assembled. The celebrated romancist has recently returned from an extended trip to Switzerland and a 15. Hams 24 for sugar cured, and 20 for with two ladies, who cannot refrain from precisely as he writes—lively, sanguine, a as announced by General Orders No. 101, of October 19, 1867, from these Headquarters, is modibon vivant, now in a poetical mood, now observing all, seemingly superficial, and yet what a deep heart is concealed under this

It is said that the currents of the world are injurious to genius. Dickens' example proves the contrary; for his creations spring from the observation of life; he would be nothing without seeing, observing and living with what he beholds. In former times his wife, a stately lady, was to be seen on such occasions. Her black eyes, her full form, her measured conduct, were in striking contrast with those of her husband, and we regret to say that the quarrel which disturbed their relations and their noisy bustle of the world."
