Mr. Bear wound up his speech by inviting the large crowd to his residence on Red Cross street, where he set out before them the good things of life, and thereby made his guests happy. Mr. Bear understands how to please an audience, and he made a perfect success of it on this occasion.

There is no field of human enterpris in which their success bas not been at one time or another notable. At the bottom of it all, apparently at the bottom of the character on which their success has been founded; we find their traditional jealousy of every acre water which covers good land. Neglecting the poor lands, they have dived into the fertile deposits lying under water and peat, and sought there a wealth that no other soil can equ Seeking this they have become pation long-enduring, sturdy, hardy, and rest lute. If a lake is to be drained, they sit quietly down and count the cost, the time and the interest that time will add to the cost, and then devise the means for the most effectual performan ce of the work; this done, the undertaking proceeds with the regularity and the persistence of the work of ants. I obstacles cannot be made auxiliaries they are overcome.
