

THE WILMINGTON POST

WILMINGTON, N. C., DECEMBER 1, 1870.

FASHION LETTER.

Fashions for December, Morning, Evening and Walking Costumes.

DEAR POST—Those who predicted the return of long skirts this season for street and walking dresses, must by this time confess themselves mistaken.

There are two favorite methods of making these costumes. One consists of a skirt and full casaque or Polonaise—the other, of two skirts, the upper one very long, and a basque, or short coat with lapels.

The new methods of trimming exhibit the most extravagant use of costly materials. Suits of rich gros grain, of the new shades, have the full and elaborate trimmings, planked flounces, and bradings lined with velvet many shades darker, and arranged so that the velvet gives the warm, rich tone to the dress without being actually seen.

Suits of velvet are very distinguished, trimmed with a very rich crochet embroidery, into which the smallest quantity of cut jet is introduced, and bordered with wide guipure lace. The overskirts are very deep at the back, but are rounded up and looped very high at the sides.

The costume is not unfrequently composed of a velvet overskirt and basque, worn over a petticoat of rich satin trimmed with very narrow flounces, and quilted into a design as a heading. Black velvet is very effective in this way, over a skirt of blue or maroon satin, the entire costume—hat, gloves, etc.—carefully carrying out the idea of the colors and other details.

The severity of the season following, close upon a very warm summer, has brought out a great many fur-trimmed suits of great beauty and elegance. Colors, such as fuchsia, maroon, wine-color and dark green, are even more fashionable than black, and are displayed to the greatest advantage by rich bands of grebe or sable fur, collars, cuffs, and revers of satin, or gros-grain trimmed on.

Jackets of quilted satin, bordered with fur, or without sleeves, are used for breakfast and morning wear, and in white satin, with swans-down edge, are not unfrequently seen in the evening.

Many dresses for dinner and evening wear, are composed of rich gros grain or poulde soie, the flounces plaited over under ones of muslin, edged with Valenciennes lace. The upper skirt is looped high, and bordered with guipure lace half a yard wide, and the waist is composed of muslin richly trimmed and having sleeves, and small loose jacket or bodice, which displays the decoration and has fancy basques attached, which take the place of sash.

Very pretty dresses are made for little girls, of white muslin, high in the neck, with long sleeves and bright Roman scarlet or blue sashes. The lower skirt is trimmed with ruffles, the upper skirt bunched at the sides, and cut into a round or pointed apron in front, and very much trimmed, as is the buffed bodice, with Valenciennes.

The winter-cloth suits for ordinary wear are becoming as popular as the linen suits for summer wear. There is no wear out to such suits, and they should be finished, therefore, with thick galloons or heavy braids that will last about as long as the material. Furs are used for trimming them by persons who expect them to serve as handsome winter suits.

In furs, sable is this winter taking the place of high class mink. It is made up in about the same style, excepting that the lining is thick gros grain, and no ornaments are used. Instead of tassels, and the like, the ends of the muff are drawn in with elastic and close warmly over the wrists.

A very handsome black toilet is of heavy lustered silk, cut with a train, and bordered with a plaited flounce, notched out over a flounce of plaited organza, edged with Valenciennes.

Above the silk flounce is a thick, soft ruffling feathered out, and above this a wide flounce of lace, also headed by a ruffling. Surmounting this is a narrow flounce of silk, with a muslin flounce beneath, and a ruffled heading. The foundation basque, bordered with rows of black and white lace, put on full; over this is the silk jacket, bordered with thick ruffling, the edge of which comes to the top of the lace.

A pretty evening costume is composed of a white llama over-dress, low square bodice and draped skirt, made entirely without ornament, with the exception of thick silk ruffles around the neck and sleeves. A wide blue sash with fringed ends completed the dress, which is charming for a young lady who is a blonde.

A fashionable "breakfast" costume consists of pink silk, made with two skirts, and a casaque, with open sleeves. The trimming is thick ruffles fringed out upon the edge, and black velvet bows. The boots are silk with black stitching and black Empress heels, the gloves pink embroidered with black. The beautiful light English pink is the favorite shade.

A fashionable promenade costume is of fine black cashmere, bordered with crimped fringe, over a black silk or gray Irish poplin skirt. The cashmere overskirt is long, and gracefully draped, the jacket cut as a basque, and open with revers. To the silk underskirt, of this costume a waist is attached, made of twilled cotton or linen. Upon this a little silk vest is mounted, and to this coat-sleeves are attached of silk, which are worn under the open ones of cashmere, and, with lace ruffles and a little cravat, complete an elegant toilet.

A warm winter walking-dress is composed of two skirts and a coat of dark-blue cloth, trimmed with heavy black galloons stitched on—five rows on the underskirt, four on the upper, three upon the coat, which is cut away from the front, and forms basque lapels. A close-fitting cotton waist is attached to the underskirt; the basque is lined with flannel.
